 - Anti-bureaucratic: child-centered, not system/government-centered
 - Anti-status quo – willingness to break it down – undercut perceptions we are perpetuating status quo
 - Historic shifts balanced with deliverables people will notice
- TONE: Positive, resolute, rallying (call to arms – our kids can do it; it will take us all), expansive: we are battling for the soul of public education

Why we are driven to action:

- The status quo is unacceptable.
- Education determines economic destiny more now than at any point in human history.
- NYC's success as a 21st century global city depends on the success of our education system.

Values behind our action:

- Every school can and should deliver an excellent education for every child.
- Every child can grow into a successful adult—ready for college, ready for life—if their education gives them the right tools.

Simple set of ideas that express/execute these values:

- Start educating children earlier so all children begin kindergarten ready to succeed.
- Make parents, the first and last teachers of children, our partners.
 - 40 minutes of parent-teacher time each week
 - Community schools
- Work with educators, not against them.
 - Educators will carry out all of this work. We must value their expertise and show respect for the hard work they do every day.
- Treat each school and each student individually. No two schools and no two children need the same support in order to excel.

- To fulfill their potential, each child will travel their own academic, social, and emotional journey
- To become great, each school needs varying support in the six key areas that comprise our Framework for Great Schools
- Break down all barriers to learning so children come to school ready to succeed.
 - Mental and physical health: community schools (social services, glasses, etc.)
 - Affordability: college savings accounts, testing waivers
- Aim high.
 - Don't relegate kids to dreaming about college, a living wage job and a career: show them
 - Every middle and high school will have a business partner
 - 100,000 kids in internships/mentorships/summer jobs by 2025 (CYE)
 - Every middle/high school student is taken on NYC college tours multiple times
 - Maintain the most rigorous curriculum/toughest tests in the nation
- Be accountable for the journey and the destination.
 - We—City leaders, school leaders, teachers, parents—are all accountable to our students. Progress Pact.
 - Schools are accountable to us not just for test scores and grad rates, but for the rigorous instruction, collaborative teachers, supportive environments, strong family-community ties, effective school leaders, and trust that improve those scores and rates. This is the Framework for Great Schools. Research shows it works.
 - We (gov't) are accountable to New Yorkers for our schools' successes and difficulties alike.
 - We are giving more information for parents and all NYers on how schools are doing, where they need help, what that help looks like.
- Spread what works. Connect the whole system.
 - Veteran educators will help fellow teachers and principals improve, spreading success throughout the system
 - Learning Partners
 - Conduct bold experiments (PROSE) and share the new practices that work.
- Treat tests as an important thing, not THE important thing.
 - They only tell you that you need to improve and where that improvement is needed—not how to get it done.
- Make the change that's necessary.
 - If schools cannot improve with our tailored and targeted support, we will change the personnel, the leadership, or the school itself.
 - But we believe most schools can and will improve, and in fact that is the only route to true citywide improvement.
- Don't stop at graduation.
 - [academic and personal/mindset interventions to get kids to enroll, persist, and complete]
 - College Savings Accounts
 - Scale ASAP to help more students make it through community college

Our vision:

Each child is supported at every turn, academically and personally, by a community of teachers, staff, and families. This community propels their child to and through college and/or a living wage job.

Our endgame goals:

- 75% four-year graduation rate – an additional 5,000 graduates – by 2020 (up from 68%)
- Double the number of college- and career-ready graduates to 50,000 a year (66%) by 2025 – WHAT COULD WE DO BY 2020 OR 2030?
- Increase the number of DOE graduates completing college by 50% by 2020 (from 13,336 to 21,117) – WHAT COULD WE DO BY 2030?
 - ➡ [Already on track to double the number of college grads coming out of CUNY by 2020]

Formatted: Highlight

Formatted

Our goals on the way, and the ways we'll know our progress towards achieving them:
[TO CHOOSE A FEW FOR SPEECH]

- 1. Every child in NYC enters kindergarten ready to learn
 - Are all eligible 4-year-olds enrolled in full-day, high-quality Pre-K? (Goal: 100%)
- 2. Every elementary school student has the academic foundation to succeed
 - How many 2nd graders are reading on grade level? (Goal: 100%)
 - How many parents of students K-2 are aware of their child's reading level (Goal: 100%)
 - How many 3rd graders are proficient in reading and writing?
 - How many 5th graders can control impulses, manage stress, motivate themselves, and set and work towards goals?
 - How many 5th graders are proficient in math (measured by the State test)?
- 3. Every middle school student is socially, emotionally, and academically ready for high school
 - Are we reducing the number of 6th graders who are chronically absent?
 - How many 7th graders show resilience in dealing with setbacks and challenges, can manage their emotions, overcome conflict, and successfully manage complex projects?
 - Conflict resolution: able to overcome conflicts and have healthy relationships with peers
 - How many 8th graders are proficient in math Are all our middle schoolers exposed to the arts and performance? (Note: this is an SED requirement)
- 4. Every high school student is on track to graduate, ready for college, career, and independent living

- Are all our 9th and 10th graders accumulating the right number and kind of credits to be on track to graduate? (Goal: 100%)
- Can our students manage and successfully complete a multi-stage assignment such as a research project—assignments they will get in college from day one and that cannot be assessed through a standardized test?
- How many high schoolers are taking AP or other college-level coursework? (Goal: ?)
- How many of our graduates do not need remedial coursework in college?
- How many high schoolers are graduating in 4 years? (Goal: 75% by 2020)
- How many graduates enroll in college? (Goal: increase enrollment rates in CUNY2, CUNY 4, non-CUNY by 25% respectively by 2020)
- Persistence

Our pledge to get there:

By 2018, every middle and high school student that enters the City's education system will be guided through this journey by a Progress Pact.

This will be a living contract among our students, families, teachers, and school leaders that outlines how each student will reach the goal of graduating high school, making to college, and succeeding all the way through.

With this contract, every student will be held accountable for driving their own learning, and every teacher, principal, and parent will be accountable for enabling that success.

LOL..

I'm open to that... Just thought that Wall Street had a real interest in seeing the city's schools succeed (and in home-grown talent getting a college education)... Maybe this is out of left field & we're too far down the road for a new policy - but thought I'd throw it out there... (Thanks a LOT, JDC!)

Would argue this works better as a private "College for all, by all" fund that every NYer is asked to contribute to, according to their means. Ex, up to $25K annual earnings, put in one dollar; $25M annual earnings, put in $500K.

Instead of a tax the rich, it's one NY, rising together....

OK do I get extra points for deB AND Marxz refs in one email?

Sorry for the delay - looks good to me...

I did want to float the idea of calling on Wall Street to put up $100M (or whatever the number is) for a private fund that would help ensure that every kid who gets to college can pay for it... It's a two-step dance... We do our part in K-12 to help get kids ready for college - and Wall Street helps them pay for it...

Adding Andie. Here's the first doc, attached. There's a lot to sift through so this is meant to bring some order to the proceedings. Note that this doesn't really detail the work underway—the HOW—of how our ideas are animated (e.g. we are Aiming High by increasing # of AP classes in underserved schools by X). The vignettes will have more of this sort of HOW.

Please let me know of concerns/thoughts/feelings/edits ASAP. Even though our meeting is canceled, I'd like to ship these docs to the Mayor tonight or ASAP.

<!--[if !supportLists]-->3. <!--[endif]-->Pull quotes/soundbites doc

I'll send these around to you all as soon as they're ready for feedback so we're all on the same page heading into 5:30. Thanks very much.

Here are our two back-up ideas (Both Still involve the mayor) but are exciting examples. Attached is the original pitch.

Original Pitch (full attached):

MBDB interviews 5 students who were in Pre-K last year about their school and what they learned.

BACK UP Ideas:

1. MBDB helps set up a school. It's a bigger ask from the Mayor while eliminating the wildcard of children. It fits his personality. It would be made up of ~20 shots of the Mayor doing tasks to get the school ready:
Decorating a classroom, cleaning a chalkboard, washing floors, testing the bell. Very light tone. Optional Tagline: "Mayoral Control at Work."
2. MBDB interview's [REDACTED]. In a tone similar to StoryCorps interviews. He's a product of the public schools off to an ivy league school. He is an exceptional example, but someone who can speak clearly about the de Blasio's commitment to public schools. This is very schedule dependent with [REDACTED].

NYC

Back To School Video

Rationale

To welcome NYC Schools' students back to school with a fun and sharable video that highlights the successes of last year's Pre-K class.

Pitch

At City Hall Mayor Bill de Blasio will interview former Pre-K students who are now prepared to begin kindergarten in the fall.

At City Hall, 5 students will be ready to be interviewed. Working with CAU and Schools, active and precocious former Pre-K students will be selected from all five Burroughs, representing the city. Mayor de Blasio will have prepared questions to ask each student about what they learned during Pre-k, what they did during their summer vacation, and how excited they are about kindergarten.

Sample Questions

- Please Introduce yourself, name and age.
- Where do you live?
- Do you like school? Why?
- Are you ready to start school again?
- What do you do during school? What is the routine?

Questions will be solicited from the student's former teachers about their specific school routine, and the specific students.

Subject: Fwd: Howard Dean to stand in for Clinton - The Boston Globe
Date: Friday, August 21, 2015 11:13:35 AM

Howard Dean, who dealt a stiff challenge from the left to former Massachusetts senator John F. Kerry during the 2004 Democratic presidential primary, will step on stage in Springfield next month on the establishment side of the 2016 contest.

The former Vermont governor, eschewing his home-state senator, Bernie Sanders, will serve as Hillary Rodham Clinton's proxy when Massachusetts Democrats gather Sept. 19 for their state party convention, sources familiar with the plans said this week.

Chairman of the national party from 2005 to 2009, Dean endorsed Clinton last year. He is now a senior adviser at Dentons, one of the world's largest law firms.

Bringing significantly less wattage, but perhaps more euphony, will be the stand-in for former Maryland governor Martin O'Malley: Boston City Councilor Matt O'Malley.

Subject: TPA- two great press opportunities with MBDB and income inequality- need sign off for planning roll out, beyond
Date: Friday, August 21, 2015 12:30:01 PM

Two great opportunities to help TPA get back up and running leading into the forum. Both would help further the local work you're doing on income inequality and give us something to push out nationally.

We're in the process of putting together the September and October message calendar (including the forum). I would like sign off to move forward giving them times. TPA would handle both directly:

1. Chris Hayes still would like to interview with MBDB. He would like to do an extended interview with him. 30-45 minutes. It could be in studio or a walk and talk. The main subject: income inequality and his tenure. Timeline: MID SEPTEMBER.

From Chris:

"The Mayor and I should an extended interview"..."yes, but also: EVERYTHING. Like, I'm a better, fairer, better read interlocutor on his entire tenure so far than a lot of the idiocy I'm seeing, and say this as someone who (like everyone) has more than my fair share of criticisms of the Mayor."

2. Sirius interview with Ari Havt Rabin Sirius- the letter below is the invite and the topic: TPA, specifically income inequality. He could highlight his bona fides and work in the city. TIMELINE: OCTOBER

SiriusXM Progress would like to host a special event featuring Mayor Bill De Blasio to highlight his work promoting the progressive agenda. This exclusive event would take place in the Fall at the SiriusXM's studios in New York City. The town hall-style event would feature Mayor De Blasio taking questions from host Ari Rabin-Havt and an intimate studio audience comprised of New York City SiriusXM subscribers.

SiriusXM's event with Mayor Bill De Blasio is part of SiriusXM's ongoing effort to have iconic figures and entertainers sitting down with studio audiences comprised of SiriusXM listeners. Previous SiriusXM specials have featured Vice President Al Gore, Senator Kristen Gillibrand, Cardinal Timothy Dolan, Senator Tom Harkin, Senator Olympia Snowe, Bruce Springsteen, Bud Selig, Harry Belafonte, Taylor Swift and many others.

After the broadcast on SiriusXM, the discussion with Mayor De Blasio will be available on SiriusXM On Demand for subscribers listening via the SiriusXM Internet Radio App for smartphones and other mobile devices or online at siriusxm.com.

SiriusXM is the world's largest radio broadcaster measured by revenue and has more than 27 million subscribers. SiriusXM creates and broadcasts commercial-free music; premier sports talk and live events; comedy; news; exclusive talk and entertainment; and the most comprehensive Latin music, sports and talk programming in radio.

RE: LEADERSHIP STRUCTURE- PROGRESSIVE AGENDA

As the Mayor of the largest city, the unique and powerful platform allows for a springboard into the media and to raise initial money. However, as Mayor of the largest city, it's imperative you are flanked with elites in different advocacy movements to help bring TPA to the next level and are able to reach into different communities, demographics and geographic areas in order to continue the work in the city but also to show that you can gather a group of elites around the most important issue of our day.

YOU however will continue to be the driving force of TPA. Particularly when it comes to gathering support and being out front on the mayoral track of the strategy. As far as main TPA work, I'd propose the following:

MAYOR BILL de BLASIO'S LEADERSHIP ROLE IN TPA
LEADERSHIP	FUNDRAISING	MESSAGE/PRESS	DIGITAL
Shape vision- founding force of TPA	Main raiser for TPA	Key spokesperson for income inequality/TPA for mayors strategy	Key signer of grassroots communications
Organize leadership team	Help manage fundraising team/principles	Key spokesperson with one or two co-chairs for TPA	Online chats/town halls with various movements
Convene key meetings with clear outcomes	Headline key events	Paint NYC as cause/effect/solutions through MBDB leadership
Provide benchmark successes/share with national press, leadership team	Call time to key, highlevel donors	Put pressure on levers of power to solve income inequality
	Prospect new non-NYC donors

Reasons, criteria:

- Represent a sector of the advocacy world or certain targeted audiences, policy makers. Therefore, the person should have a wide reach and be largely respected nationally by not only progressives but those in that field/sector;
- Help elevate the prominence, seriousness of the issue. Unexpected bedfellows of high profile people who represent various interests AND have national reach are good targets. Examples- members of the business community and those who represent poverty issues or working people/labor issues. Think movement leadership;
- Help raise money for TPA- while not all will be able to help or have inroads into donor communities, most should. Or they should add to the strategic and focused nature and lend credibility among donor circles. Each would need to commit to raise $250,000 over two years (with the exception of faith);
- Represent the New American Majority- having women, Latino, African American and those who appeal to millennial and those on the cusp of Generation X show diversity but also a strength in partnerships to fight income inequality

- Lastly, they should be able to sign on more support through online, political outreach and other methods based on the credibility of their work in their area of expertise.

Locking down co-chairs quick would allow us to work with them on fundraising, press and outreach strategies. They would be rolled out with you as founding chair.

Suggestions:

- Business leader- Nick Hanauer, Tom Steyer
- Faith community- Reverend William Barber
- Working People- Maria Elena Durazo, Liz Shuler (ST of the national AFL-CIO)
- Policy experts- Robert Reich, Joseph Stiglitz
- Opinion makers- Senator Elizabeth Warren
- Civil Rights (?)- Congressman John Lewis, Dolores Huerta

*(unlikely but worth asking),  need to explain rationale

Timeline: commitments by September 1; Needs: Prospectus to give them and expectations to lay out

Decisions to be made:

Planning & Strategy:

- ✓ Leadership strategy
- ✓ Mayor and National, Accountability and Zeitgeist
- ✓ Pledge: Mayors to sign on with a specific ask of key elected (Presidential, U. S. Senators, etc
- ✓ Budget:
- ✓ Fundraising firm: prospecting, coordinating with existing team
- ✓ Digital firm
- ✓ Staffing: Research/Policy/Comms type
- ✓ Forum- team

Scheduling

- Call Time- fundraising and political
- Press- process- doesn't come off before both sides discuss then bring to Tom? for tiebreaker

Press

- Chris Hayes
- Sirius
- Vice- 2 train

THE PROGRESSIVE AGENDA

The Progressive Agenda is an organization that is dedicated to combatting income inequality. As part of a growing movement TPA will work with progressive groups, think tanks, opinion leaders and grassroots supporters, to hold policy makers accountable and bring stability back to our economy so that all people can work to live and have a better life. Working with a strong leadership team headed up by Mayor Bill de Blasio, TPA will rely on its prominent supporters and partners to carry out its goal on two tracks: national and local levels.

Organizational Goals

In order to see the mission of TPA realized, the organizational goals should span from May 2015 announcement through the presidential election in 2020.

How do we define "winning" organizationally?
Long Term: December 2020 on	Mid Term: March 2017- November 2020	Short Term: May 2015- March 2017
Healthier income levels relative to various classes	Policy solutions adopted through legislation	Change conversation to solutions
More opportunity for all	Electing those who are pro EE	Pressure policy makers to pledge change
Better oversight and regulations	Policy solutions through executive orders where applicable	Large coalition built to hold policy makers accountable

What makes TPA unique?

There are many groups who are active on some aspects of the income inequality solution-finding space and they've been around for quite some time. There are also groups who push certain solutions by using specific tactics. However, there is not one unifying and coordinating entity in the progressive community that is taking on the issue as a whole. Executed well, TPA could become that entity while making sure not to emulate existing organizations in this space.

Further, there is a powerful coalition that has remained untapped in the fight against income inequality: the cohesive voice of mayors around the country, who can be pressuring policy makers to solve income inequality and put the economy back in balance.

Therefore, TPA will fill the void in two major ways:

- Unifying groups and individuals around a message calendar and sharing content to create a “message hub” on income inequality for the progressive movement;
- Utilizing grasstops pressure from mayors to force solutions on income inequality

How do we move message to push change?
Targets	Influencers	Vehicles
Control policy/can change policies	Can influence targets- based on power	Tools and variety of tactics to carry messaging to targets
Presidential candidates	Policy makers	Digital
President-elect	Key Electeds	Press
Policy makers	Coalition/Powerful orgs	Political
	Donors	Paid Media
	Reporters	Field
	Grassroots- enough voters to win

Tactical Organizations
Policy	Message	Digital	Paid Media	Earned Media	Grassroots	Grasstops
CAP	Candidates	MoveOn.org	Candidates	Media Matters	Candidates	Unions
EPI	Committees	Candidates	Committees	Candidates	Unions
Roosevelt	Americans United	Committees	Ind Exp	Committees	Progress Now
Center for Budget and Policy Priorities				Unions	CCC
Center for Media and Democracy					NPA
DEMOS					CPD
					PICO

Benchmarks and Timeline- covers May 2015 through March 2017

- Phase 1 (Now through the Presidential primaries/presumptive nominees)
 - All large city mayors signed on TPA, pledging to ask policy makers for specific legislation
 - Specific TPA questions asked throughout debate process

- Message “hub” communications process set up with materials warehouse
- Message calendar in place with policy, research
- Organizational and leadership roll out
- Branding begins
- KICK OFF September 9th, 2015
- Phase 2 (Primaries through nominations/conventions)
 - Pledges from key U.S. Senators on specific policies
 - Pledges from presidential candidates on specific policies
- Phase 3 (Nomination through the General)
 - Nominees on record as supporting or not supporting policy pledges
- Phase 4 (General through inauguration)
 - Pledged policy makers submit or support legislation on income inequality
- Phase 5 (First 100 days in office)
 - Start accountability campaign against those who did not pledge and those who did pledge and renege.
 - Similar to Mayor de Blasio’s 2013 race and campaign message- by this point the message should be clear on what is expected of the president-elect on income inequality

Policy Goals (Short Term)

Moving forward, there must be actionable, measurable, and tangible short term goals to actualize TPA’s long term mission. By using a disciplined plan and leadership structure we can accomplish these goals and serve the dual objective of building the organization brand, which will help to establish its role and attract other potential supporters.

ASK of supporters to policy makers

- Demand policy makers pledge to take specific action to combat income inequality by either sponsoring, drafting, voting for policy in one of the following categories:

The Progressive Agenda
Lift the Floor for Working People: Value Work	Family Comes First: Support Working Families	Changed Rules: Tax and corporate fairness
Increase minimum wage to $15/hour	Pass a comprehensive scheduling bill	Close the carried interest loophole.
Labor law reform to protect and grow working people's right to organize in the work place	Pass national paid family leave.	End tax breaks for companies that ship jobs overseas.
Immigration reform to prevent the exploitation of low-wage workers.	Make Pre-K, after-school programs and childcare universal.	Implement the “Buffett Rule” so millionaires pay their fair share.
Invest in education, criminal justice reform	Expand the Earned Income Tax Credit, protect and expand Social Security.	Close the CEO pay loophole
Paid national paid sick leave	College debt reform, support debt-free college.	Oppose trade deals that hurt business, workers and the environment

Strategy

TPA will get pledges from policy makers in positions to make a difference. By doing this and making them public, the hope is that these policy makers will be held accountable to actually make these changes. Using mayors in their leadership roles are also perfect ways to illustrate that federal action is required to solve the problems that have manifested in different ways on the local level. Meanwhile, the signers will provide a flank for mayors on the need for federal action through an aggressive surrogate strategy to change the Zeitgeist from problem to driving solutions. Inciting immediate action of policy makers is crucial, lest cities continue to devolve into war zones as the income gap widens.

Pledges asked of policy makers come from three places:

- Mayors directly to policy makers (Mayor BDB recruits)
- TPA signers to policy makers (MBDB, co-chairs/leadership recruits)
- Organizing individuals- Online and offline grassroots activists to policy makers (coalition, TPA recruits)

1. Mayors- illustrate effects, solutions needed on the backdrop of cities
 - o Employ mayors to highlight effects of income inequality, needs to improve their cities and ask candidates to pledge solutions during the campaign AND when in office using NYC as a touch point and ongoing example of a mayor doing what he can to affect income inequality.
 - o Leverage earned and online media to highlight mayors' work

PRIORITIZING SIGNER OUTREACH
Swing States (relevant pre/post election)	Large Cities (non-swing)
Colorado	Boston
Florida	Chicago
Iowa*	Houston
Michigan	Los Angeles
Nevada*	Miami
New Hampshire*	New York
New Mexico*	San Francisco
North Carolina
Ohio
Pennsylvania
Virginia
Wisconsin

2. TPA Signers- change the zeitgeist

- Work in coalition to become the progressive message hub on income inequality
- Message specific policy prescriptions under economic messaging that mobilizes opinion leaders, individuals and policy makers
- Build and work in a coalition around income inequality to create an echo chamber
- Arm individuals, the coalition with messaging and content for their constituents in the states as well as share policy, message research from other groups
- Insert solutions into public debate at all levels through all forms of media

3. Organize- work and build a coalition to unify and create an echo chamber

- Discipline work based on coordinating a message calendar that tells a story from cause to effect to solution
 - Cause- enemies that have manipulated political and economics policies over time
 - Effect- what large, impactful ramifications are of income inequality
 - Solutions- what mayors are doing around the country to fix but need more federal intervention to truly put the economy back where it needs to be
- Organize various groups such as
 - Policy and Content, think tanks
 - Issue-based organizations
 - Membership based organizations
 - Electoral groups
- Gather and coordinate content with partners and similarly aligned organizations
- Potential early states field strategy to dig deep in Iowa, New Hampshire, Nevada, South Carolina- goal #s to be determined

Leadership Structure

TPA is positioned strongly with Mayor de Blasio as Founding Chair. To round out a strong leadership, fundraising team as well send a message to opinion makers, TPA will consider prominent co-chairs. They will represent a broad, cross movement coalition from the business, policy, faith-based community as well as the New American Majority. This will be the leadership team that is most dedicated to the success of the movement.

Suggestions:

- Business leader- Nick Hanauer, Tom Steyer
- Faith community- Reverend William Barber
- Working People- Maria Elena Durazo, Rich Trumka (Liz Shuler)
- Policy experts- Robert Reich, Joseph Stiglitz
- Opinion Leaders- Senator Elizabeth Warren, Tavis Smiley
- Civil Rights (?)- Congressman John Lewis, Dolores Huerta

Signers are leaders that are elected and leaders who have constituencies that the Mayor and co-chairs bring on board to echo the message and push the pledge on income inequality. Under this umbrella but separate for multiple reasons including press there should be a Mayors' Council for TPA.

Organizations will follow under the signers category but will also be treated separately for messaging and action purposes but also have leaders and staff whose relationships will be maintained but kept as different types of surrogates.

Timeline: commitments for co-chairs by September 1; Needs: Prospectus to give them and expectations to lay out.

Next Steps

Following sign off of strategy and budget:

August

- Plan and budget completed
- RFP process for fundraising operation, search for press, research, digital
- Fundraising firm hired
- Messaging "package" decided for use
- Press staffer hired
- Research underway (political, policy)
- Digital staff/consultants identified
- Leadership structure discussed
- TPA organization launched (ED, councils/signers structure)
- Message and organization calendar created
- Forum locked in, planning and implementation begins

Next steps (first week):

- Setting up fundraising discussion, draft RFP
- Determine immediate target focus
- Power analysis of targets
- Discuss "leadership needs", who, why, feasible?
- Develop ongoing communications of brain trust (who is this?)
- Set up call to discuss plan outline, thoughts, edits, etc.
- Start recruiting for press, fundraising, research (maybe contract)
- Set up message call/meeting with AFL-CIO analytics staff to get download of message research
- Develop prospectus

I think we should think of a mayors council and co chairs possibly. A council of home rule mayors would be good.

Is It Time For The Mayor To Do Town Halls?

GOTHAM GAZETTE – Ben Max

<http://www.gothamgazette.com/index.php/government/5858-is-it-time-for-the-mayor-to-do-town-halls>

Scott Stringer has led 16 town hall-style events since becoming Comptroller; Letitia James, the Public Advocate, hosted her 28th on Wednesday night in Brooklyn. As has been well-documented, Mayor Bill de Blasio - along with Stringer and James, one of three popularly-elected citywide officials - has not yet held a town hall event himself.

Is it time for the mayor to host one?

As de Blasio and his team wrestle with how to combat sagging public opinion poll numbers, what they see as unfair press coverage, and a perception gap that many agree leaves New Yorkers thinking de Blasio is performing worse than he actually is, it may be time for de Blasio to take his message directly to the people and hold his first town hall.

"He might want to look at where his criticism is coming from in his base," says Fordham political science professor Dr. Christina Greer. "If you're going to do a town hall, be strategic about it, so that it is effective for you and for New Yorkers," Greer advises.

Greer says that de Blasio should target where he had the deepest support in his 2013 election, with an eye, though, "especially on people feeling neglected," and go communicate with them. She said that these would be "productive places to start, but can't be the end."

Political consultant Evan Thies argues it would be smart for de Blasio to utilize his elected allies to get his message out, possibly at town hall-style events. "If they believe they can get those surrogates to host friendly conversations with real New Yorkers they should do that," Thies said, adding that de Blasio is suffering from a major perception problem and that he and his team need to resume "politicking."

"The perception" among the public, Thies says, "is not just that he's not the doing the job they hired him for, the perception is that he doesn't care about opinions that aren't his. And I just don't think that's true. He's trying to lead on issues of affordability - it's really just a perception problem and he needs to get out there and talk to people."

Doing so in the form of town halls would surely be risky for the mayor, who mostly plays things safe, but public forums are high-risk, high-reward opportunities. De Blasio could show New Yorkers that he is engaged, that his ear is to the ground, and that he is both tough and humble.

"The risk is not any worse than having the tabloids portray him as they are now," says former Rep. Anthony Weiner, who held many town halls when in office and has urged de Blasio to adopt the practice.

Sure, Weiner says, there can be some tough moments, and the TV cameras will gravitate toward those. But, holding town halls has many advantages: "You become a better representative when you do it...you hear the language real citizens use to describe the problems in their lives," Weiner tells Gotham Gazette.

"It would help him with a lot of the problems that he has," Weiner argues of the mayor. "He develops a little bit more of a fighter identity. If you're standing up in a hostile room, people respect that. There's a sense he's being pushed around too much, town halls gives you the opportunity to change that."

As of now, no one would call de Blasio a hothead or peg him as likely to commit a serious gaffe, but of course a public event with open microphones would leave the mayor prone to all sorts of challenges. (For example, we've seen of late what Black Lives Matter activists have accomplished at several presidential candidate events.) But, these events are always well-staffed with aides and security.

Even if he does a few town halls, there would be inevitable questions about where he's held them, and surely some media latching on to any outrageous moments.

However, nothing says 'I'm listening' like actually listening. And it appears the mayor needs a bit of a correction to perceptions that he's distracted by national politics and not a strong enough chief executive of this very hard to manage city.

In correspondence with City Hall, it does not appear that a de Blasio-led town hall is afoot.

Spokesperson Karen Hinton wrote Gotham Gazette saying, "Mayor de Blasio hears directly from New Yorkers in both formal and informal ways - whether it's through taking calls on public radio, or being stopped on the street - as he often is."

Indeed, in what was a rare formal opportunity for the mayor to engage in unscripted conversation with constituents, de Blasio took calls while on air with radio host Brian Lehrer Wednesday morning. All told, de Blasio's WNYC appearance lasted more than 40 minutes and gave the mayor a chance to speak directly to a wide swath of New Yorkers, and with several who called in.

Doing so, de Blasio again showed he is adept at responding to impromptu gripes about the city and his stewardship of it. Yet, the mayor has made only sporadic appearances on call-in radio.

Hinton's response echoes what the mayor himself has said when asked about holding town halls, something that his predecessors did with varying frequency - but did - and that his current fellow citywide electeds are clearly doing fairly regularly.

Public Advocate James held one town hall in each borough specifically about mayoral control of city schools, releasing a report afterward in which she called for some modifications to the system that would weaken the mayor's power. Among her twenty-plus other open events, James held a public safety town hall Wednesday evening in Brooklyn in response to a recent wave of shootings.

Comptroller Stringer has held at least one town hall in each borough, according to his office.

Stringer held a "Sandy Oversight Hearing" in each borough other than the Bronx, which was the borough least damaged by the superstorm.

A spokesperson for the comptroller, Eric Sumberg, said that Stringer "believes that listening to constituents and meeting with them in their communities is one of the best ways to learn how he can use his office to root out waste and fraud and fight for working families."

Hinton, the de Blasio spokesperson, told Gotham Gazette that representatives of the administration are "out in neighborhoods across the city every single day, working directly with New Yorkers and bringing that feedback to City Hall to further shape our work. We are continually looking for additional opportunities to hear directly from New Yorkers across the five boroughs."

Highlighting efforts by the Community Affairs Unit, Hinton cited "dozens of town halls" organized around informing small business owners, improving city services for LGBTQ New Yorkers, and providing information on the city's handling of the recent Legionnaires' Disease outbreak in the Bronx.

To New Yorkers who feel good, bad, or iffy about the mayor, though, those efforts may not be enough. "Sometimes people want to see the mayor, not his proxy," says Dr. Greer, Fordham political science professor.

This, in part, is why the mayor marches in many parades, speaks at churches, and appears at a variety of other community events. There may be nothing quite like the unfiltered town hall, though, to move the public image of de Blasio, as Weiner points out.

In May, de Blasio was asked about plans to hold town halls on at least two different occasions. On May 11, de Blasio said he hears from New Yorkers all the time. "[I]t's amazing how many conversations I have with people every single day because they're not shy about coming up and starting a conversation, I assure you – every time I'm on the subway, every time I'm walking down the street and whether it's the Upper East Side or Park Slope or anywhere else. But beyond that, I talk to people who represent a whole host of communities all the time."

On May 18, de Blasio said of holding town halls, "I don't have a specific plan, but, you know, what I do all the time is go out around different communities in different settings...people just come up and talk about things, and offer their views, raise concerns...I go around all over the place – and the subways, and walking down the street – talk to everybody."

A spokesperson for Public Advocate James wrote Gotham Gazette that the public advocate has "worked aggressively to bring government to every corner of this city" and that the best way to connect constituents and government "is by reaching the people where they are."

It is certainly not a sentiment de Blasio would disagree with, and the mayor often highlights that he's bringing government to those who need it most, whether or not he is holding the type of open evening events his colleagues are. On Thursday, de Blasio held a ground-breaking in Far Rockaway for what will be 154 affordable housing units for low-income seniors.

At the mid-day press conference, de Blasio said affordable housing is the number one thing brought up to him by New Yorkers "on the subway, on the street - wherever I go."

Attached are two documents (I will have a few handouts) for the meeting.

Re the agenda- I took a mini strategic planning approach so we could answer some big questions- vision, what do we consider success- which can often be illusion in issue campaigns and start up organizations. This includes assessing how we are unique in this space.

Second, I've broken it down so we can discuss goals and strategy. Outside of a few key tactics (forum, field) it's largely big picture and if there is sign off on goals, strategy, deliverables the next phase will be a component and schedule planning around different tactics and implementation for the divisions (press, political, digital, research etc).

Lastly, deliverables, budget are big items with a short list I have on key decisions for you should we agree on larger concept and goals.

We are trying to fit a lot in three hours so we are going to be focused on the big items which emanates from vision.

Attached is an agenda and a plan outline. I will have a few back up documents ready.

THE PROGRESSIVE AGENDA

The Progressive Agenda is an organization that is dedicated to combatting income inequality. As part of a growing movement TPA will work with progressive groups, think tanks, opinion leaders and grassroots supporters, to hold policy makers accountable and bring stability back to our economy so that all people can work to live and have a better life. Working with a strong leadership team headed up by Mayor Bill de Blasio, TPA will rely on its prominent supporters and partners to carry out its goal on two tracks: national and local levels.

Organizational Goals

In order to see the mission of TPA realized, the organizational goals should span from May 2015 announcement through the presidential election in 2020.

How do we define "winning" organizationally?
Long Term: December 2020 on	Mid Term: March 2017- November 2020	Short Term: May 2015- March 2017
Healthier income levels relative to various classes	Policy solutions adopted through legislation	Change conversation to solutions
More opportunity for all	Electing those who are pro EE	Pressure policy makers to pledge change
Better oversight and regulations	Policy solutions through executive orders where applicable	Large coalition built to hold policy makers accountable

What makes TPA unique?

There are many groups who are active on some aspects of the income inequality solution-finding space and they've been around for quite some time. There are also groups who push certain solutions by using specific tactics. However, there is not one unifying and coordinating entity in the progressive community that is taking on the issue as a whole. Executed well, TPA could become that entity while making sure not to emulate existing organizations in this space.

Further, there is a powerful coalition that has remained untapped in the fight against income inequality: the cohesive voice of mayors around the country, who can be pressuring policy makers to solve income inequality and put the economy back in balance.

Therefore, TPA will fill the void in two major ways:

- Unifying groups and individuals around a message calendar and sharing content to create a “message hub” on income inequality for the progressive movement;
- Utilizing grasstops pressure from mayors to force solutions on income inequality

How do we move message to push change?
Targets	Influencers	Vehicles
Control policy/can change policies	Can influence targets- based on power	Tools and variety of tactics to carry messaging to targets
Presidential candidates	Policy makers	Digital
President-elect	Key Electeds	Press
Policy makers	Coalition/Powerful orgs	Political
	Donors	Paid Media
	Reporters	Field
	Grassroots- enough voters to win

Tactical Organizations
Policy	Message	Digital	Paid Media	Earned Media	Grassroots	Grasstops
CAP	Candidates	MoveOn.org	Candidates	Media Matters	Candidates	Unions
EPI	Committees	Candidates	Committees	Candidates	Unions
Roosevelt	Americans United	Committees	Ind Exp	Committees	Progress Now
Center for Budget and Policy Priorities				Unions	CCC
Center for Media and Democracy					NPA
DEMOS					CPD
					PICO

Benchmarks and Timeline- covers May 2015 through March 2017

- Phase 1 (Now through the Presidential primaries/presumptive nominees)
 - All large city mayors signed on TPA, pledging to ask policy makers for specific legislation
 - Specific TPA questions asked throughout debate process

- Message “hub” communications process set up with materials warehouse
- Message calendar in place with policy, research
- Organizational and leadership roll out
- Branding begins
- KICK OFF September 9th, 2015
- Phase 2 (Primaries through nominations/conventions)
 - Pledges from key U.S. Senators on specific policies
 - Pledges from presidential candidates on specific policies
- Phase 3 (Nomination through the General)
 - Nominees on record as supporting or not supporting policy pledges
- Phase 4 (General through inauguration)
 - Pledged policy makers submit or support legislation on income inequality
- Phase 5 (First 100 days in office)
 - Start accountability campaign against those who did not pledge and those who did pledge and reneged.
 - Similar to Mayor de Blasio’s 2013 race and campaign message- by this point the message should be clear on what is expected of the president-elect on income inequality

Policy Goals (Short Term)

Moving forward, there must be actionable, measurable, and tangible short term goals to actualize TPA’s long term mission. By using a disciplined plan and leadership structure we can accomplish these goals and serve the dual objective of building the organization brand, which will help to establish its role and attract other potential supporters.

ASK of supporters to policy makers

- Demand policy makers pledge to take specific action to combat income inequality by either sponsoring, drafting, voting for policy in one of the following categories:

The Progressive Agenda
Lift the Floor for Working People: Value Work	Family Comes First: Support Working Families	Changed Rules: Tax and corporate fairness
Increase minimum wage to $15/hour	Pass a comprehensive scheduling bill	Close the carried interest loophole.
Labor law reform to protect and grow working people's right to organize in the work place	Pass national paid family leave.	End tax breaks for companies that ship jobs overseas.
Immigration reform to prevent the exploitation of low-wage workers.	Make Pre-K, after-school programs and childcare universal.	Implement the “Buffett Rule” so millionaires pay their fair share.
Invest in education, criminal justice reform	Expand the Earned Income Tax Credit, protect and expand Social Security.	Close the CEO pay loophole
Paid national paid sick leave	College debt reform, support debt-free college.	Oppose trade deals that hurt business, workers and the environment

Strategy

TPA will get pledges from policy makers in positions to make a difference. By doing this and making them public, the hope is that these policy makers will be held accountable to actually make these changes. Using mayors in their leadership roles are also perfect ways to illustrate that federal action is required to solve the problems that have manifested in different ways on the local level. Meanwhile, the signers will provide a flank for mayors on the need for federal action through an aggressive surrogate strategy to change the Zeitgeist from problem to driving solutions. Inciting immediate action of policy makers is crucial, lest cities continue to devolve into war zones as the income gap widens.

Pledges asked of policy makers come from three places:

- Mayors directly to policy makers (Mayor BDB recruits)
- TPA signers to policy makers (MBDB, co-chairs/leadership recruits)
- Organizing individuals- Online and offline grassroots activists to policy makers (coalition, TPA recruits)

TPA will have a message plan and calendar that illustrates cause, effect, need for change and solutions over the first two years. Example of the first month of the roll-out:

~ September 2015 ~
◀ August						October ▶
Sunday	Monday	Tuesday	Wednesday	Thursday	Friday	Saturday
		1 TPA Pol call for TPA Pol co-	2	3	4	5
6	7 LABOR DAY	8 Congress	9 NYC First	10	11	12
TPA PRESS/DIG: Sept 9, Org roll-out. Co-Chairs, Staff, Goals
13	14	15	16 MBDB	17	18	19
TPA PRESS/DIG- MAYORS ROLL-OUT WEEK: highlight NYC and MBDB- Hayes and Sirius? Education speech; TPA POLITICAL- signers briefing call
20	21	22	23	24 Pope: Poverty and	25 Pope: Poverty and	26
TPA PRESS/DIG: Frame Causes of Income Inequality w/overall solutions- Vice Interview,
27	28	29 REICH	30	Notes
TPA: Frame Causes (CONT) of Income Inequality w/overall solutions - Reich hits Plan long
	TPA Pol- Kickoff: ~ ...

The combining of the narrative (locally and nationally) will pressure and be a part of forcing change with a coalition. Therefore the TPA strategy through 2016 will rely on three interdependent parts:

1. Mayors- illustrate effects, solutions needed on the backdrop of cities
 - Employ mayors to highlight effects of income inequality, needs to improve their cities and ask candidates to pledge solutions during the campaign AND when in office using NYC as a touch point and ongoing example of a mayor doing what he can to affect income inequality.
 - Leverage earned and online media to highlight mayors' work

PRIORITIZING SIGNER OUTREACH
Swing States (relevant pre/post election)	Large Cities (non-swing)
Colorado	Boston
Florida	Chicago
Iowa*	Houston
Michigan	Los Angeles
Nevada*	Miami
New Hampshire*	New York
New Mexico*	San Francisco
North Carolina
Ohio
Pennsylvania
Virginia
Wisconsin

2. TPA Signers- change the zeitgeist
 - Work in coalition to become the progressive message hub on income inequality
 - Message specific policy prescriptions under economic messaging that mobilizes opinion leaders, individuals and policy makers
 - Build and work in a coalition around income inequality to create an echo chamber
 - Arm individuals, the coalition with messaging and content for their constituents in the states as well as share policy, message research from other groups
 - Insert solutions into public debate at all levels through all forms of media
3. Organize- work and build a coalition to unify and create an echo chamber

- Discipline work based on coordinating a message calendar that tells a story from cause to effect to solution
 - Cause- enemies that have manipulated political and economics policies over time
 - Effect- what large, impactful ramifications are of income inequality
 - Solutions- what mayors are doing around the country to fix but need more federal intervention to truly put the economy back where it needs to be
- Organize various groups such as
 - Policy and Content, think tanks
 - Issue-based organizations
 - Membership based organizations
 - Electoral groups
- Gather and coordinate content with partners and similarly aligned organizations
- Potential early states field strategy to dig deep in Iowa, New Hampshire, Nevada, South Carolina- goal #s to be determined

Each strategy will have a detailed plan once concepts are signed off on.

Leadership Structure

As the Mayor of the largest city, the unique and powerful platform allows for a springboard into the media and to raise initial money. However, as Mayor of the largest city, it's imperative you are flanked with elites in different advocacy movements to help bring TPA to the next level and are able to reach into different communities, demographics and geographic areas in order to continue the work in the city but also to show that you can gather a group of elites around the most important issue of our day.

Mayor de Blasio will continue to be the driving force of TPA. Particularly when it comes to gathering support and being out front on the mayoral track of the strategy. Most importantly, NYC is perfect illustration of the cause, the effect and the solution- with one leaders role in particular trying to solve it. That will be the local focus that needs to be magnified nationally and with other mayors. Below is a proposed list understanding the Mayor's time is sparse.

MAYOR BILL de BLASIO'S LEADERSHIP ROLE IN TPA
LEADERSHIP	FUNDRAISING	MESSAGE/PRESS	DIGITAL
Shape vision- founding force of TPA	Main raiser for TPA	Key spokesperson for income inequality/TPA for mayors strategy	Key signer of grassroots communications
Organize leadership team	Help manage fundraising team/principles	Key spokesperson with one or two co-chairs for TPA	Online chats/town halls with various movements
Convene key meetings with clear outcomes	Headline key events	Paint NYC as cause/effect/solutions through MBDB leadership
Provide benchmark successes/share with national	Call time to key, highlevel donors	Put pressure on levers of power to solve income inequality
	Prospect new non-NYC donors

TPA is positioned strongly with Mayor de Blasio as Founding Chair. To round out a strong leadership, fundraising team as well send a message to opinion makers, TPA should consider prominent co-chairs. Also, it will take many movements working together to push the kind of change needed to right our economy. Co-chairs will need to represent a broad, cross movement coalition from the business, policy, faith-based community as well as the New American Majority as examples. This will be the leadership team that is most dedicated to the success of TPA.

Suggestions:

- Business leader- Nick Hanauer, Tom Steyer
- Faith community- Reverend William Barber
- Working People- Maria Elena Durazo, Rich Trumka (Liz Shuler)
- Policy experts- Robert Reich, Joseph Stiglitz
- Opinion Leaders- Senator Elizabeth Warren, Tavis Smiley
- Civil Rights (?)- Congressman John Lewis, Dolores Huerta

Signers are leaders that are elected and leaders who have constituencies that the Mayor and co-chairs bring on board to echo the message and push the pledge on income inequality. Under this umbrella but separate for multiple reasons including press there should be a Mayors' Council for TPA.

Organizations will follow under the signers category but will also be treated separately for messaging and action purposes but also have leaders and staff whose relationships will be maintained but kept as different types of surrogates.

Timeline: commitments for co-chairs by September 1; Needs: Prospectus to give them and expectations to lay out.

Next Steps

Following sign off of strategy and budget:

August

- Plan and budget completed
- Forum locked, planning and implementation begins: logistics, political and press plan ready to be executed
- RFP process for fundraising operation, search for press, research, digital
- Fundraising firm hired
- Messaging "package" decided for use
- Press staffer hired
- Research underway (political, policy)
- Digital staff/consultants identified
- Leadership structure discussed, decided
- TPA organization launched (ED, councils/signers structure)
- Message and organization calendar created

Next steps (first week):

- Setting up fundraising discussion, draft RFP
- Determine immediate target focus
- Power analysis of targets
- Discuss "leadership needs", who, why, feasible?
- Develop ongoing communications of brain trust (who is this?)
- Set up call to discuss plan outline, thoughts, edits, etc.
- Start recruiting for press, fundraising, research (maybe contract)
- Develop prospectus
- Message delivery

Attached are two documents (I will have a few handouts) for the meeting.

Re the agenda- I took a mini strategic planning approach so we could answer some big questions- vision, what do we consider success- which can often be illusion in issue campaigns and start up organizations. This includes assessing how we are unique in this space.

Second, I've broken it down so we can discuss goals and strategy. Outside of a few key tactics (forum, field) it's largely big picture and if there is sign off on goals, strategy, deliverables the next phase will be a component and schedule planning around different tactics and implementation for the divisions (press, political, digital, research etc).

Lastly, deliverables, budget are big items with a short list I have on key decisions for you should we agree on larger concept and goals.

We are trying to fit a lot in three hours so we are going to be focused on the big items which emanates from vision.

Attached is an agenda and a plan outline. I will have a few back up documents ready.

RE: EARLY STATES OPTIONS, SUGGESTIONS

Goal: Grow a list of supporters to carry out actions on the ground through the primary and caucus dates. Also, add to a national list of activists for TPA.

Below are options should you want to focus on early states in particular.

1. Online Grassroots Activists

The overall online plan is to grow a national list that can be used to organize to specific actions and fundraise. To focus on the early states, acquisition can be more focused on IA, NH, SC, NV sites. There could also be online campaigns specific to those states as the list grows leading into the primaries. TPA could rent or purchase lists from candidates and organizations who would make them available.

2. Grassroots- TPA partners with other organizations

TPA would plan, implement with other organizations that are more resourced or longer existing organizations with an already existing activist and organizer-base. We would broker a partnership to infuse scripts, petitions, deliver message with TPA specific language and goals. Potential groups: AFL-CIO, NextGen Climate, National Peoples' Action, Progress NOW.

3. Grassroots- TPA

TPA would build its own field program, hire field and press staff nationally and in states to carry out message delivery, gather signatures or create press to affect income inequality solutions.

Although TPA is focusing on the most relevant and prominent issue of our day, the nascent organization would need time, money to stand up a TPA only field operation on the ground. My suggestion would be to focus on building an online grassroots list with additional online advertising in early states to raise the issue alongside the candidates and groups with long existing field operations to help add messaging for targeted audiences.

Pope's visits to Cuba, U.S. to highlight families, charity, tolerance

By Cindy Wooden Catholic News Service

VATICAN CITY (CNS) -- In word and deed, Pope Francis will take his vision of a Catholic's approach to family life, parish life, charity, economics, immigration and good governance to Cuba and the United States during a Sept. 19-27 visit.

Visiting both Cuba and the United States on the same trip not only acknowledges his role in encouraging detente between them, but will give Pope Francis an opportunity to demonstrate that while different political and cultural challenges face Catholics in both countries, the Gospel and its values are the same.

On June 30, the Vatican published the detailed schedule of Pope Francis' Sept. 19-22 visit to Cuba and his Sept. 22-27 visit to the United States.

For Pope Francis, one of the key values Catholics in the U.S. and Cuba share is the obligation to "go out," proclaiming the Gospel and bringing God's mercy to the poorest and most disadvantaged people.

The standard of living in the United States may be exponentially higher than in Cuba, but in Pope Francis' vision that only increases the responsibility of U.S. Catholics to reach out and to share. He will demonstrate what he means when he meets homeless people in Washington Sept. 24, children and immigrant families at a Catholic school in Harlem when he visits New York Sept. 25, and prisoners Sept. 27 in Philadelphia.

The closing Mass for the World Meeting of Families will follow the papal meeting with prisoners. The World Meeting of Families international congress Sept. 22-25 and the celebration of families with the pope Sept. 26-27 were the initial reason for the papal visit.

With the Catholic Church's constant concern for promoting strong families and with the world Synod of Bishops on the family set to start one week after the papal visit, marriage and family life are expected to be topics throughout the pope's visit to both Cuba and the United States.

Long before the Vatican released the full trip itinerary, it had confirmed certain parts of it: U.S. President Barack Obama will welcome the pope to the White House Sept. 23; that afternoon, Pope Francis will celebrate Mass at the Basilica of the National Shrine of the Immaculate Conception and canonize Blessed Junipero Serra; the pope will address a joint meeting of Congress Sept. 24, becoming the first pope to do so; and Pope Francis will address the U.N. General Assembly Sept. 25. It is thought the pope may bring up some of the points he made in his recent environmental encyclical, "Laudato Si'," given that world nations will come together just a few months later for the United Nations Climate Change Conference in Paris in the hopes of reaching global agreement on reducing greenhouse gases.

The pope also is expected to emphasize the contributions of U.S. Catholics to society, defend religious liberty and support the church's right to uphold its teaching, including in its employment practices. He will use his visit to ground zero in New York as an occasion for an interreligious gathering.

The pope will spend three days in Cuba visiting three different cities, including the popular Shrine of Our Lady of Charity of El Cobre.

He will hold the usual meetings with President Raul Castro, young people, families and religious as well as celebrate Mass and vespers all three days. But he also will bless the cities of Holguin and Santiago de Cuba -- blessing Holguin from a panoramic hilltop and pilgrimage site called Cross Hill.

It will be his third visit to the Americas after Brazil in 2013 and Ecuador, Bolivia and Paraguay in July, and his 10th trip abroad since his election in 2013.

Here is the schedule for the trip. All times are local unless otherwise indicated.

1. When is next prep?

2. When do we want to give the speech? Target date?

3. We need to finalize decisions and costs addressed in the speech -- need to decide what we're really willing to commit here, and then have proper briefings with the city council, etc

THE PROGRESSIVE AGENDA

The Progressive Agenda is an organization that is dedicated to combatting income inequality. As part of a growing movement TPA will work with progressive groups, think tanks, opinion leaders and grassroots supporters, to hold policy makers accountable and bring stability back to our economy so that all people can work to live and have a better life. Working with a strong leadership team headed up by Mayor Bill de Blasio, TPA will rely on its prominent supporters and partners to carry out its goal on two tracks: national and local levels.

Organizational Goals

In order to see the mission of TPA realized, the organizational goals should span from May 2015 announcement through the presidential election in 2020.

How do we define "winning" organizationally?
Long Term: December 2020 on	Mid Term: March 2017- November 2020	Short Term: May 2015- March 2017
Healthier income levels relative to various classes	Policy solutions adopted through legislation	Change conversation to solutions
More opportunity for all	Supporting, promoting ballot initiatives and referenda	Pressure policy makers to pledge to make change
Better oversight and regulations	Policy solutions through executive orders where applicable	Large coalition built to hold policy makers accountable

What makes TPA unique?

There are many groups who are active on some aspects of the income inequality solution-finding space and they've been around for quite some time. There are also groups who push certain solutions by using specific tactics. However, there is not one unifying and coordinating entity in the progressive community that is taking on the issue as a whole. Executed well, TPA could become that entity while making sure not to emulate existing organizations in this space.

Further, there is a powerful coalition that has remained untapped in the fight against income inequality: the cohesive voice of mayors around the country, who can be pressuring policy makers to solve income inequality and put the economy back in balance.

Therefore, TPA will focus on two major strategies to fill the void:

- Working in coalition with progressive groups, unify message and build a discipline around income inequality solutions
- Use the power and pulpit of mayors to push substantive change on income inequality

How do we move message to push change?
Targets	Influencers	Vehicles
Policy makers who control and make policy	Can influence targets- based on power	Tools and variety of tactics to carry messaging to targets
Agency heads, boards	Sympathetic policy makers	Digital
Presidential candidates	Key Electeds	Press
President elect	Coalition/Powerful orgs and leader	Political
	Donors	Paid Media
	Reporters	Field
	Grassroots- enough voters to win

Tactical Organizations
Policy	Message	Digital	Paid Media	Earned Media	Grassroots	Grasstops
CAP	Candidates	MoveOn.org	Candidates	Media Matters	Candidates	Unions
EPI	Committees	Candidates	Committees	Candidates	Unions
Roosevelt	Americans United	Committees	Ind Exp	Committees	Progress Now
Center for Budget and Policy Priorities				Unions	CCC
Center for Media and Democracy					NPA
DEMOS					CPD
					PICO

Benchmarks and Timeline- covers May 2015 through March 2017

- Phase 1 (Now through the Presidential primaries/presumptive nominees)
 - All large city mayors signed on TPA, pledging to ask policy makers for specific legislation
 - Specific TPA questions asked throughout debate process
 - Message "hub" communications process set up with materials warehouse
 - Message calendar in place with policy, research

- Organizational and leadership roll out
- Branding begins
- KICK OFF September 9th, 2015
- Phase 2 (Primaries through nominations/conventions)
 - Pledges from key U.S. Senators on specific policies
 - Pledges from presidential candidates on specific policies
- Phase 3 (Nomination through the General)
 - Nominees on record as supporting or not supporting policy pledges
- Phase 4 (General through inauguration)
 - Pledged policy makers submit or support legislation on income inequality
- Phase 5 (First 100 days in office)
 - Start accountability campaign against those who did not pledge and those who did pledge and reneged.
 - Similar to Mayor de Blasio's 2013 race and campaign message- by this point the message should be clear on what is expected of the president-elect on income inequality

Goals (Short Term)

Moving forward, there must be actionable, measurable, and tangible short term goals to actualize TPA's long term mission. By using a disciplined plan and leadership structure we can accomplish these goals and serve the dual objective of building the organization brand, which will help to establish its role and attract other potential supporters.

Levels of Asks

- Signers- These are influential that the mayor or other principles ask to sign on and agree to TPA's policy points. They should also be committed to speak out on all or specific policies through all media avenues
 - Electeds should be committed to do the above AND support legislation that moves forward solving income inequality
- Mayors- In addition to the above list, TPA accountability strategy rests on mayors both highlighting their cities' problems due to income inequality, what they have done to fix and what their needs of the federal government. Based on that, the asks might look as follows to get in their words (we provide research for targets before calls as well):
 - Would YOU make a personal ask of the presidential candidate (or relevant policy maker) to pledge to fill that need when in office?

ASK of supporters to policy makers

- Demand policy makers pledge to take specific action to combat income inequality by either sponsoring, drafting, voting for policy in one of the following categories:

The Progressive Agenda
Lift the Floor for Working People: Value Work	Family Comes First: Support Working Families	Changed Rules: Tax and corporate fairness
Increase minimum wage to $15/hour	Pass a comprehensive scheduling bill	Close the carried interest loophole.
Labor law reform to protect and grow working people's right to organize in the work place	Pass national paid family leave.	End tax breaks for companies that ship jobs overseas.
Immigration reform to prevent the exploitation of low wage workers.	Make Pre-K, after-school programs and childcare universal.	Implement the "Buffett Rule" so millionaires pay their fair share.
Invest in education, criminal justice reform	Expand the Earned Income Tax Credit, protect and expand Social Security.	Close the CEO pay loophole
Paid national paid sick leave	College debt reform, support debt-free college.	Oppose trade deals that hurt business, workers and the environment

Strategy

TPA will get pledges from policy makers in positions to make a difference. By doing this and making them public, the hope is that these policy makers will be held accountable to actually make these changes. Using mayors in their leadership roles are also perfect ways to illustrate that federal action is required to solve the problems that have manifested in different ways on the local level. Meanwhile, the signers will provide a flank for mayors on the need for federal action through an aggressive surrogate strategy to change the Zeitgeist from problem to driving solutions. Inciting immediate action of policy makers is crucial, lest cities continue to devolve into war zones as the income gap widens.

Pledges asked of policy makers come from three places:

- Mayors directly to policy makers (Mayor BDB recruits)
- TPA signers to policy makers (MBDB, co-chairs/leadership recruits)
- Organizing individuals- Online and offline grassroots activists to policy makers (coalition, TPA recruits)

TPA will have a message plan and calendar that illustrates cause, effect, need for change and solutions over the first two years. Example of the first month of the roll-out:

~ September 2015 ~
← August						October ►
Sunday	Monday	Tuesday	Wednesday	Thursday	Friday	Saturday
		1 TPA Pol: call for TPA Pol: co-	2	3 Sample	4	5
6	7 LABOR DAY	8 Congress	9 NYC First	10	11	12
TPA PRESS/DIG: Sept 9, Org roll-out: Co-Chairs, Staff, Goals
13	14	15	16 MBDB	17	18	19
TPA PRESS/DIG- MAYORS ROLL-OUT WEEK: highlight NYC and MBDB- Hayes and Sirius? Education speech; TPA POLITICAL- signers briefing call
20	21	22	23	24 Pope. Poverty and	25 Pope. Poverty and	26
TPA PRESS/DIG: Frame Causes of Income Inequality w/overall solutions- Vice Interview,
27	28	29 REICH	30	Notes:
	TPA Pol: Kickoff:

The combining of the narrative (locally and nationally) will pressure and be a part of forcing change with a coalition. Therefore, the TPA strategy through 2016 will rely on three interdependent parts:

1. Mayors- illustrate effects, solutions needed on the backdrop of cities
 - Employ mayors to highlight effects of income inequality, needs to improve their cities and ask candidates to pledge solutions during the campaign AND when in office using NYC as a touch point and ongoing example of a mayor doing what he can to affect income inequality.
 - Leverage earned and online media to highlight mayors' work

PRIORITIZING SIGNER OUTREACH
Swing States (relevant pre/post election)	Large Cities (non-swing)
Colorado	Boston
Florida	Chicago
Iowa*	Houston
Michigan	Los Angeles
Nevada*	Miami
New Hampshire*	New York
New Mexico*	San Francisco
North Carolina
Ohio
Pennsylvania
Virginia
Wisconsin

Metrics: Have 30-40 of the mayors signed on and 75% to hold the President elect accountable with specifics by December 2016.

2. TPA Signers- change the zeitgeist

- Work in coalition to become the progressive message hub on income inequality
- Message specific policy prescriptions under economic messaging that mobilizes opinion leaders, individuals and policy makers
- Build and work in a coalition around income inequality to create an echo chamber
- Arm individuals, the coalition with messaging and content for their constituents in the states as well as share policy, message research from other groups
- Insert solutions into public debate at all levels through all forms of media

3. Organize- work and build a coalition to unify and create an echo chamber

- Discipline work based on coordinating a message calendar that tells a story from cause to effect to solution
 - Cause- enemies that have manipulated political and economics policies over time
 - Effect- what large, impactful ramifications are of income inequality
 - Solutions- what mayors are doing around the country to fix but need more federal intervention to truly put the economy back where it needs to be
- Organize various groups such as
 - Policy and Content, think tanks
 - Issue-based organizations
 - Membership based organizations

- Electoral groups
 - Gather and coordinate content with partners and similarly aligned organizations
 - Potential early states field strategy to dig deep in Iowa, New Hampshire, Nevada, South Carolina- goal #s to be determined

Each strategy will have a detailed plan once concepts are signed off on.

Leadership Structure

As the Mayor of the largest city, the unique and powerful platform allows for a springboard into the media and to raise initial money. However, as Mayor of the largest city, it's imperative you are flanked with elites in different advocacy movements to help bring TPA to the next level and are able to reach into different communities, demographics and geographic areas in order to continue the work in the city but also to show that you can gather a group of elites around the most important issue of our day.

Mayor de Blasio will continue to be the driving force of TPA. Particularly when it comes to gathering support and being out front on the mayoral track of the strategy. Most importantly, NYC is perfect illustration of the cause, the effect and the solution- with one leader's role in particular trying to solve it. That will be the local focus that needs to be magnified nationally and with other mayors. Below is a proposed list understanding the Mayor's time is sparse.

MAYOR BILL de BLASIO'S LEADERSHIP ROLE IN TPA
LEADERSHIP	FUNDRAISING	MESSAGE/PRESS	DIGITAL
Shape vision- founding force of TPA	Main raiser for TPA	Key spokesperson for income inequality/TPA for mayors strategy	Key signer of grassroots communications
Organize leadership team	Help manage fundraising team/principles	Key spokesperson with one or two co-chairs for TPA	Online chats/town halls with various movements
Convene key meetings with clear outcomes	Headline key events	Paint NYC as cause/effect/solutions through MBDB leadership
Provide benchmark successes/share with national	Call time to key, highlevel donors	Put pressure on levers of power to solve income inequality
	Prospect new non-NYC donors

TPA is positioned strongly with Mayor de Blasio as Founding Chair. To round out a strong leadership, fundraising team as well send a message to opinion makers, TPA should consider prominent co-chairs. Also, it will take many movements working together to push the kind of change needed to right our economy. Co-chairs will need to represent a broad, cross movement coalition from the business, policy, faith-based community as well as the New American Majority as examples. This will be the leadership team that is most dedicated to the success of TPA.

Suggestions:

- Business leader- Nick Hanauer, Tom Steyer
- Faith community- Reverend William Barber
- Working People- Maria Elena Durazo, Rich Trumka (Liz Shuler)
- Policy experts- Robert Reich, Joseph Stiglitz
- Opinion Leaders- Senator Elizabeth Warren, Tavis Smiley
- Civil Rights (?)- Congressman John Lewis, Dolores Huerta

Signers are leaders that are elected and leaders who have constituencies that the Mayor and co-chairs bring on board to echo the message and push the pledge on income inequality. Under this umbrella but separate for multiple reasons including press there should be a Mayors' Council for TPA.

Organizations will follow under the signers category but will also be treated separately for messaging and action purposes but also have leaders and staff whose relationships will be maintained but kept as different types of surrogates.

Timeline: commitments for co-chairs by September 1; Needs: Prospectus to give them and expectations to lay out.

Next Steps

Following sign off of strategy and budget:

August

- Plan and budget completed

- Forum locked, planning and implementation begins: logistics, political and press plan ready to be executed
- RFP process for fundraising operation, search for press, research, digital
- Fundraising firm hired
- Messaging “package” decided for use
- Press staffer hired
- Research underway (political, policy)
- Digital staff/consultants identified
- Leadership structure discussed, decided
- TPA organization launched (ED, councils/signers structure)
- Message and organization calendar created

Next steps (first week):

- Setting up fundraising discussion, draft RFP
- Determine immediate target focus
- Power analysis of targets
- Discuss “leadership needs”, who, why, feasible?
- Develop ongoing communications of brain trust (who is this?)
- Set up call to discuss plan outline, thoughts, edits, etc.
- Start recruiting for press, fundraising, research (maybe contract)
- Develop prospectus
- Message delivery

Hi there -

I just spoke with Jonathan and found out that the only other Mayor potentially on board is Dayton, Ohio.

We can't do an event with just NY & Dayton – so it seems like this may be falling apart.

Do you want to cancel the event?

Let us know and we are happy to jump on a call to discuss.

Hi Andrea,

Hope you are well and enjoying your summer! I wanted to check back in about Mayor DeBlasio's appearance on our show. We're really excited to have him here.

He's going to be second guest on Wednesday — the lead guest is Neil Patrick Harris (it's a big priority for the network to have him here to promote his new show).

I did want to see if he would be open to doing something extra, in addition to his appearance. Our writers came up with this bit, which I've attached the script for. It would likely be an extra 45 minutes of his time - including hair/make-up/grooming - and we would likely tape this before show time, but if he is interested, I can confirm specific timing details then.

Let me know your thoughts when you can.
Thank you!
My best,
Sarah

A MESSAGE FROM MAYOR BILL DE BLASIO
(MAYOR DE BLASIO)

V.O.

And now a message from New York City Mayor Bill de
Blasio.

BILL DE BLASIO IS SEATED IN
THE SECOND CHANCE THEATER SET
WHERE SETH SITS.

MAYOR DE BLASIO

Hello, I'm Bill de Blasio,
Today I'd like to talk to the citizens of New York about some of the great strides
we've made as a city: Housing is more affordable than ever,
our universal pre-kindergarten program is strengthening the city's education system, and every day we are working harder to increase transparency in city government.

BEAT.

But one message I would like to impress upon all New Yorkers is this: Look up from your damn phones. Seriously.
What the hell are you doing?
This isn't downtown Wichita.
It's New York City. People need to get where they need to go. The last thing they want is some oblivious ding dong standing at the top of the subway stairs watching
Transformers on his cell phone. Hey ding dongs, I got one word for you: Move!

BEAT.

Speaking of the subway, New York City averages 5.6 million subway passengers each and every day. Don't be the guy that keeps his 50-pound back pack on. Come on, man. Take

the it off and put it in between your feet. It's common sense. And I swear to God, if I see another standing
pregnant woman on the subway,
I'm gonna rip somebody's arms
off. And I can do it, too. I'm like 8 feet tall and I can bench the Chrysler Building.

BEAT.

The bottom line is this: We have to share this city so be considerate and treat everyone with respect. In other words, pull your head out of your ass.

BEAT.

Goodnight, and God bless New York City.

Feel like it could be funny if he delivers it the right way.

What about pitching them on doing a workout spoof?

I need to get back to them soon about this script. They would need more time with him if we decide to do it Thoughts? I like that we get our message out early in it. But I didn't find it that funny....

Hi Andrea,

Hope you are well and enjoying your summer! I wanted to check back in about Mayor DeBlasio's appearance on our show. We're really excited to have him here.

He's going to be second guest on Wednesday — the lead guest is Neil Patrick Harris (it's a big priority for the network to have him here to promote his new show).

I did want to see if he would be open to doing something extra, in addition to his appearance. Our writers came up with this bit, which I've attached the script for. It would likely be an extra 45 minutes of his time - including hair/make-up/grooming - and we would likely tape this before show time, but if he is interested, I can confirm specific timing details then.

Let me know your thoughts when you can.

Thank you!

My best,

Sarah

I actually like it. In my experience, these scripts are never as funny on paper as they are in execution (studio audience primed to laugh, people not expecting a mayor to be funny, etc).

Only flag is saying housing is more affordable than ever (and transparency stuff - maybe). Might switch to crime is near a record low and more people have jobs than any time since 1976 - something that's not going to invite a fact-check from a humorless columnist in the opening lines.

Hi there -

I just spoke with Jonathan and found out that the only other Mayor potentially on board is Dayton, Ohio.

We can't do an event with just NY & Dayton – so it seems like this may be falling apart.

Do you want to cancel the event?

Let us know and we are happy to jump on a call to discuss.

Yea-- I think we should treat this as any other Mayoral event with press.

I'm happy to coordinate on content/policy-- as folks on DM teams do, but it should go through the normal process with advance/logistics, etc. right?

Subject: Sept 10 Mayor's Event

Hi All--

Wanted to touch base with you regarding a Mayoral event coming up in a few weeks to make sure it is on everyone's radar.

On September 10 at 4:30PM the Mayor is hosting a screening of a Robert Greenwald movie about how the top 25 hedgefunders in the country make more than all of the kindergarten teachers combined, and teachers are also being taxed at a higher rate than hedgefund billionaires.

The movie is short (5-10 minutes) and the format though not set yet, will likely be opening remarks by BDB who intros the movie, screen the movie, then conversation with BDB (tbd) Robert Greenwald, others-- maybe a teacher, Carmen, etc.

We also need to get audience there for the screening. Not sure who else we need to loop in to make all of this happen, but wanted to get the conversation started.

JDC and I have been working with Greenwald so far, and have booked the space with PACE, but since it is a Mayoral event, i assume we need to loop in other agency folks, staff who can help crowdbuild, etc.

Would love to hear your thoughts on who else should be involved, next steps, etc.

Thanks,

Hayley

On press...

1. Eliminate off-topic altogether? I know we are already talking about limiting.
2. Have PW or KH do on the record gaggles, similar to WH, so reporters can get their off-topic questions in while limiting the "exclusive" questions coming into CH?
3. Tweet photos of MBDB on subway, working late at night?
4. Have MBDB personally tweet late at night (needs to be thought through - but could demonstrate how late our guy works).

Subject: Sept 10 Mayor's Event

Hi All--

Wanted to touch base with you regarding a Mayoral event coming up in a few weeks to make sure it is on everyone's radar.

On September 10 at 4:30PM the Mayor is hosting a screening of a Robert Greenwald movie about how the top 25 hedgefunders in the country make more than all of the kindergarten teachers combined, and teachers are also being taxed at a higher rate than hedgefund billionaires.

The movie is short (5-10 minutes) and the format though not set yet, will likely be opening remarks by BDB who intros the movie, screen the movie, then conversation with BDB (tbd) Robert Greenwald, others-- maybe a teacher, Carmen, etc.

We also need to get audience there for the screening. Not sure who else we need to loop in to make all of this happen, but wanted to get the conversation started.

JDC and I have been working with Greenwald so far, and have booked the space with PACE, but since it is a Mayoral event, i assume we need to loop in other agency folks, staff who can help crowdbuild, etc.

Would love to hear your thoughts on who else should be involved, next steps, etc.

Thanks,

Hayley

EDUCATION VISION 2015: Update August 20, 4:39pm

Our vision:

Each student is supported at every turn of their journey, academically and personally, by a strong community of educators and family. Together, we help every child get to—and succeed through—college or a living wage job.

Speech Headline:

NYC Becomes Nation's Largest City to Set College Completion Goal –50% More DOE Students to Graduate College by 2030

Speech construction notes:

- College is the fulcrum
 - We cannot fulfill our destiny unless every child who wants to go to college can
 - What is City's new vision of how to get kids to college, how to succeed there, how to afford it, and everything K-12 that supports that?
- APPROACH:
 - Anti-bureaucratic: speech child-centered, not government-centered
 - Anti-status quo: show willingness to break it down – undercut perceptions we are perpetuating it
 - Historic shifts balanced with deliverables people will notice
 - Highlight what we've done that's working, and new goals/initiatives
- TONE: Positive, resolute, rallying (call to arms – our kids can do it; it will take us all), expansive: we are battling for the soul of public education

Endgame Goals:

- 75% four-year grad rate – an additional 5,000 grads each year – by 2020 (up from 68%)
- Double the number of college- and career-ready graduates to 50,000 a year (66%) by 2025
- Increase the number of DOE graduates completing college by 50% by 2030

Speech sections:

Why we are driven to action:

- The status quo is unacceptable.
- Education determines economic destiny more now than at any point in human history.
- NYC's success as a 21st century global city depends on the success of our education system.

Values behind our action:

- Every school can and should deliver an excellent education for every child.
- Every child can grow into a successful adult—ready for college, ready for life—if their education gives them the right tools.

Simple set of ideas that express/execute these values:

- Start educating children earlier so all begin kindergarten ready to succeed.
 - UPK
- Make parents, the first and last teachers of children, our partners.
 - 40 minutes of parent-teacher time each week
 - Community schools
- Work with educators, not against them.
 - Educators will carry out all of this work. We must value their expertise and show respect for the hard work they do every day.
- Treat each school and each student individually. No two schools and no two children need the same support in order to excel.
 - To fulfill their potential, each child will travel their own academic, social, and emotional journey
 - To become great, each school needs varying support in curriculum, teaching, administrative leadership, family engagement, and building trust in the school community (the areas that comprise our Framework for Great Schools)
- Break down all barriers to learning so children come to school ready to succeed.
 - Mental and physical health: community schools (social services, glasses, etc.)
 - Affordability: college savings accounts, testing waivers

- Aim high.
 - AP for All, Algebra for All
 - Don't relegate kids to dreaming about college, a living wage job and a career: show them
 - Every middle and high school will have a business partner
 - 100,000 kids in internships/mentorships/summer jobs by 2025 (CYE)
 - Every middle/high school student is taken on NYC college tours multiple times
 - Maintain the most rigorous curriculum/toughest tests in the nation
- Be accountable for the journey and the destination.
 - Schools are accountable to us not just for test scores and grad rates, but for the rigorous instruction, collaborative teachers, supportive environments, strong family-community ties, effective school leaders, and trust that improve those scores and rates. This is the Framework for Great Schools. Research shows it works.
 - We—City leaders, school leaders, teachers, parents—are all accountable to our students. Student Progress Pact.
 - We (gov't) are accountable to New Yorkers for our schools' overall successes and difficulties alike.
 - We are giving more information for parents and all NYers on how schools are doing, where they need help, what that help looks like.
- Spread what works. Connect the whole system.
 - Veteran educators will help fellow teachers and principals improve, spreading success throughout the system
 - Learning Partners
 - Conduct bold experiments (PROSE) and share practices that work.
- Treat tests as an important thing, not THE important thing.
 - They only tell you that you need to improve and where that improvement is needed—not how to get it done.
- Make the change that's necessary.
 - If schools cannot improve with our tailored and targeted support, we will change the personnel, the leadership, or the school itself.
 - But we believe most schools can and will improve, and in fact that is the only route to true citywide improvement.
- Don't stop at graduation.
 - [academic and personal/mindset interventions to get kids to enroll, persist, and complete]
 - College Savings Accounts

- Scale ASAP to help more students make it through community college

Speech Vignettes:

I. 8am: A four year-old is intently focused on building a tower of blocks, as her classmates play behind her – singing with a teacher, drawing early masterpieces, gazing at beginner books. Our four year-old’s teacher will soon gather everyone for [SOME ACTIVITY INSPIRED BY RECENT PROFESSIONAL DEVELOPMENT]

[THEMES: EARLY LEARNING, HIGH-QUALITY TEACHING/PROFESSIONAL DEVELOPMENT]

Goals:

- Free, full-day, high-quality pre-k for everyone
- Professional development for X pre-K teachers?

II. 8:30am: A second grader rides the bus to school with a parent, proudly showing off the book the class has been reading—explaining what it’s about and which character she was chosen to play in a class activity yesterday. At her school, which has struggled in recent years, a teacher is leading the kind of reading and writing workshops used at high-performing schools – making sure that all kids have access to the best curriculum, and best instruction.

[THEMES: LITERACY, PARENT ENGAGEMENT, SPECIAL NEEDS ED?]

Goals:

- Every 2nd grader will read on grade level
- By 2017, every single family of a K-2 student will know their child’s reading level.

Plan of Action:

- Schools will constantly be sharing information about their child’s reading progress, and tools families can use to support their literacy
- if a kid is off track, struggling to learn to read, we will identify and intervene earlier through a [NEW CADRE?] of specialists who understand what it takes to help a struggling student read
- DO WE WANT TO ADD: Every elementary school child will have access to challenging summer programming because summer learning loss is a serious issue for our students AND/OR increase summer programming for students by 50% by 2018 – IS THERE FUNDING FOR THIS?

III. Noon: An eighth grader hunched over an algebra book in the library finally solves $A^2 + B^2 = C^2$, and sits back in wonder. She glances up at the clock to see how many minutes are left till her advisory session, when she can tell her adviser how hard it was—and how it feels to finally get it.

Our student been struggling with a lot of anger, frustration, and sadness this year, and her adviser’s office has been her sanctuary. They talk for an hour, and then the adviser sends our student home with a family permission form to participate in a big day next week: a college tour. She’ll be the first in her family to see the inside of a college classroom.

[THEMES: COMMUNITY SCHOOLS, SOCIAL/EMOTIONAL LEARNING, AIMING HIGH/COLLEGE]

Goals:

- Every middle school student is socially, emotionally, and academically ready for high school, and exposed to college by the time they enter 9th grade.

Plan of Action:

- Physical and mental health services for students at our community schools – can we quantify?
- Expand afterschool programs for all middle school students, providing nurturing and academic focus that middle school students need

IV. 3:30pm: A tenth grader runs her fingers over the pages of her ELA workbook. As a recent immigrant, she needs to pass the English Regents to graduate—so her school staff has created this extended learning period for her and the 15 other English Language Learners in the class.

Each year, 20,000 students who begin high school don’t finish.

[THEMES: RENEWAL SCHOOLS, ELLs, SUMMER JOBS]

Goals:

- Get every high school student on track to graduate ready for college, career, and independent living.
- 75% four-year graduation rate – an additional 5,000 graduates – by 2020 (up from 68%)
- Double the number of college- and career-ready graduates to 50,000 a year (66%) by 2025 – WHAT COULD WE DO BY 2020 OR 2030?

Plan of Action:

- Increase # of AP and other advanced courses in traditionally underserved schools
- Everything we're doing for Renewal Schools
- Learning Partners – peer/professional development for teachers
- Increase the number of CTE programs, because CTE students are more likely to graduate high school than their non CTE student counterparts – and have better outcomes for young male students of color

V. 5pm: A recent graduate comes home from her summer job cleaning hotel rooms to a letter from her [community?] college. It's her fall semester reading list. Total price of textbooks: $600.

Each year, 20,000 students who graduate high school do not enter college.

[THEMES: TACKLING "SUMMER MELT," COLLEGE AFFORDABILITY FOR ALL]

We will not allow finances, fear, or the unfamiliar to be a barrier to education.

Plan of Action:

- Savings programs – a college savings account for every student to support and encourage family savings for college from a young age
- Tackling hidden financial barriers – transportation, textbooks
- Mentoring (YMI)

VI. 8:30pm: After a morning spent at a part-time job and classes all afternoon and into the evening, a college sophomore enters the subway and carefully puts away her Metrocard. At the right stop, she runs up the stairs and greets her study group inside a public library. At stations all over the City, they each swiped a Metrocard provided by CUNY in order to be able to meet in one place and study for the next day's exam.

Each year, 17,000 students who begin college do not finish.

[THEMES: AFFORDABILITY, PERSONAL AND ACADEMIC SUPPORT FOR COLLEGE GRADUATION]

Plan of Action:

- Expand CUNY ASAP
- Improving advisement/mentoring – mindset interventions
- Low-cost reminders to help stay on top of academic career – text messages, emails
- Helping kids reapply for FAFSA

VII. It's 8 a.m., the next day: a college senior grabs her buzzing phone off the kitchen table. It's lighting up with text messages from her mother, her high school adviser, the manager at the internship she just finished – “Go get ‘em!” She smiles and puts it in her purse, then turns to face her reflection in a mirror. Smoothing of lapels, one deep breath, and running to the elevator: on the way out the door for a job interview.

[THEMES: AIMING HIGH, COMMUNITY SUPPORT]

Goal: 50% more DOE grads with college degrees by 2020.

Plan of Action:

- Everything we just revealed

A woman walks through the Old Campus at Yale University. According to Fleischer, Yale paid nearly half a billion dollars to private equity managers

Transcript

Michelle McLoughlin/Reuters/Landov

In a sharp-elbowed opinion piece in The New York Times this week, Victor Fleischer, a law professor at the University of San Diego, took several big-name schools to task for the ways that they handle their endowments.

Fleischer cited Harvard, the University of Texas, Stanford and Princeton — but he reserved his harshest criticism for Yale University, which he says pays private equity firms $480 million a year to handle its endowment. Meanwhile, he says the school spends only $170 million dollars on financial aid for students — while tuition often rises.

"As some of these endowments grow larger and larger, the group that benefits the most is not students; it's not faculty. It's the fund managers who manage the money," Fleischer says. "The point is: What is the endowment there to serve? The point is to advance teaching and research and scientific inquiry today."

He points to the ways the universities managed their money during the tough financial losses of the financial crisis.

"It's striking that, in those circumstances where you would expect the universities to tap into the endowment for a lot of support, they didn't. Instead, the focus was on growing the endowment back to the previous size."

Fleischer's argument moved Malcolm Gladwell, the author and New Yorker writer, to fire off a barrage of tweets excoriating Yale and the other schools featured in Fleischer's article.

"I've gotten increasingly incensed at the inequality in American higher ed," Gladwell tells NPR's Scott Simon. "There's a handful of schools that just have too much money."

Yale supplied NPR with a statement saying their endowment provides $1 billion a year — or fully a third — of Yale's budget, which they say is much greater than the revenue they get from student tuition. And they say that more than half of their students receive financial aid.

But that argument doesn't persuade Gladwell, who finds fault not with how the money is spent, but the sheer amount the institution has accumulated.

"Do you need $26 billion to provide that level of service?" he says. "Is our educational system better or worse off for having a small number of schools with a massive amount of money, and a very large number of schools who are hurting?"

Interview Highlights

On his reaction to Yale's response

It's absolutely the case that Yale's doing fine. I'm not questioning that at all, and they're able to do great things with their money — you just have to walk through the Yale campus to see what money will buy you, which is a country club, right? Extraordinary facilities.

But we have to look at this in the big picture: There are tons and tons of other students at other colleges who are carrying enormous debt loads through their 20s and even into their 30s because school has gotten so expensive.

On what he'd like schools such as Yale to do about that inequality

I think they have to stand up and say, at the very least, "We do not deserve to have tax-exempt status for our endowments."

It's one thing if a school has an endowment of $500 million that they are stretching a million different ways to meet the needs of its students, to say that as a society, we should allow them to escape taxes so they can spend their money on education. That logic does not hold when you've got $35 billion in the bank, as Harvard does.

On the relationships between universities and the hedge fund managers who donate to them

I think people are free to pay money managers what money managers charge, and money managers are free to do with their money whatever they want. The issue is that all of this circular system is tax-deductible. You and I, and everyone else in America, are subsidizing this activity.

I'm happy to subsidize as a taxpayer things that I think are a worthwhile use of my money and things that I think advance the general cause of happiness and social justice in this country. I don't see why I should be subsidizing the $26 billion endowment of Yale so they can afford to spend half a billion dollars each year paying their hedge fund managers. That's the issue: It's our money!

Yesterday, I tweeted from a study that was done by this group called Nexus which calculated the per student annual taxpayer contribution for different kinds of educational institutions in this country — so, the value of all of the money taxpayers give institutions. For the typical community college in this country, it comes out to [between $2,000 and] $4,000 per student per year. For a typical state school, it's $10,000 per year. For Harvard, it's $48,000 per year. For Yale, it's $69,000 per student per year. And for Princeton, it's $105,000 per student per year of taxpayer subsidy.

That's obscene! That's why I'm upset. that's why I go on these twitterstorms, and that's why people like Victor Fleischer write op-eds! Because there's something wrong with a society that spends 50 times more subsidizing the students at Princeton than it does subsidizing the students of a typical community college. That's wrong.

Two great opportunities to help TPA get back up and running leading into the forum. Both would help further the local work you're doing on income inequality and give us something to push out nationally.

We're in the process of putting together the September and October message calendar (including the forum). I would like sign off to move forward giving them times. TPA would handle both directly:

1. Chris Hayes still would like to interview with MBDB. He would like to do an extended interview with him. 30-45 minutes. It could be in studio or a walk and talk. The main subject: income inequality and his tenure. Timeline: MID SEPTEMBER.

From Chris:

"The Mayor and I should an extended interview"... "yes, but also: EVERYTHING. Like, I'm a better, fairer, better read interlocutor on his entire tenure so far than a lot of the idiocy I'm seeing, and say this as someone who (like everyone) has more than my fair share of criticisms of the Mayor."

2. Sirius interview with Ari Havt Rabin Sirius- the letter below is the invite and the topic: TPA, specifically income inequality. He could highlight his bona fides and work in the city.

TIMELINE: OCTOBER

SiriusXM Progress would like to host a special event featuring Mayor Bill De Blasio to highlight his work promoting the progressive agenda. This exclusive event would take place in the Fall at the SiriusXM's studios in New York City. The town hall-style event would feature Mayor De Blasio taking questions from host Ari Rabin-Havt and an intimate studio audience comprised of New York City SiriusXM subscribers.

SiriusXM's event with Mayor Bill De Blasio is part of SiriusXM's ongoing effort to have iconic figures and entertainers sitting down with studio audiences comprised of SiriusXM listeners. Previous SiriusXM specials have featured Vice President Al Gore, Senator Kristen Gillibrand, Cardinal Timothy Dolan, Senator Tom Harkin, Senator Olympia Snowe, Bruce Springsteen, Bud Selig, Harry Belafonte, Taylor Swift and many others.

After the broadcast on SiriusXM, the discussion with Mayor De Blasio will be available on SiriusXM On Demand for subscribers listening via the SiriusXM Internet Radio App for smartphones and other mobile devices or online at siriusxm.com.

SiriusXM is the world's largest radio broadcaster measured by revenue and has more than 27 million subscribers. SiriusXM creates and broadcasts commercial-free music; premier sports talk and live events; comedy; news; exclusive talk and entertainment; and the most comprehensive Latin music, sports and talk programming in radio.

Gillibrand, Backing $15 Wage, Puts Her Closer To Sanders

<image001.jpg>From the Morning Memo:

U.S. Sen. Kirsten Gillibrand on Monday sent an email to supporters pushing a $15 minimum wage on the federal level — a stance that puts her closer to Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders than the woman who last occupied her seat in the Senate, Hillary Clinton.

In the email, Gillibrand writes that she’s “had it” with the lack of a wage increase in Washington, pointing to low wages impacting not teenagers, but women and older workers.

“Americans are working full time only to have hallmarks of success – home ownership, sending their children to college, the dignity of retirement – exist on a distant horizon. No matter how hard they work, they can’t get any closer,” Gillibrand wrote in the email. “And women represent nearly two-thirds of minimum-wage workers.”

Gillibrand urges supporters to include their email addresses — a method of gathering targeted supporters for core issues — to a petition backing the $15 wage.

Sanders, a self-identified socialist running in the Democratic presidential primary, has vocally pushed for a $15 minimum wage, part of his broader campaign pledge to fight income inequality if elected.

Another Democratic presidential hopeful, former Maryland Gov. Martin O’Malley, also backs $15.

Clinton, a former New York senator from 2001 through 2009, said last month she was supportive of a $15 minimum wage for fast-food workers, acknowledging a national campaign to raise wages for workers in that industry.

Clinton’s support came as New York moves to raise the fast-food workers’ wages administratively through the Department of Labor at the behest of Gov. Andrew Cuomo, an ally of both Hillary and her husband, former President Bill Clinton.

Still, Clinton doesn't necessarily back a broader $15 minimum wage. In July, Clinton spoke favorably of a \$12 minimum wage.

Both proposals are still higher than the initial push made by President Obama in 2014 for a $10.10 minimum wage.

Gillibrand is a staunch supporter of Clinton in the Democratic presidential primary, but has spoken warmly of Sanders.

"She is my candidate, she is the best candidate," Gillibrand told NY1 earlier this month.

"But I think Bernie just adds more to the primary and I think people like primaries."

Hey,

Am back in the office.....Please know that I've circulated this request several times to the appropriate internals but unfortunately it's a very slow time with most of our members away for the summer break. Our school year does not commence until Wednesday, September 9th so most of our folks are still away. FYI, We've got a staff retreat on August 31st and perhaps we'll have better luck for names of interested kindergarten teachers then. I've placed a call/email to Lynn Yabroudi, a kindergarten special ed teacher, who initially was very interested but I haven't heard anything back. It does seem strange that none of the teachers contacted were interested in participating but we've had a lot going on in NYC re evaluations & testing. Perhaps folks just got caught up in that.

My understanding is that no one internally is aware of any event with the Mayor in September re this project but please keep in mind that the first few days of school are particularly hectic and our members will be in their respective schools. It would be helpful if we had the logistics of the event as soon as possible. Goes without saying that I'll keep working this until our retreat...
Best, Maureen

Hi John & Maureen -

I am following up on this one last time.

It would be VERY helpful to have NY kindergarten teacher in the film and for the event in NY.

Now that school is back in in many places, are there a few you can connect us to this week?

We need them asap to film them, edit the piece, and have it ready for the event.

Thanks for the quick response. We reached out to all of the teachers you gave us info for, but only two responded and neither were ultimately willing to participate.

Thus, we would LOVE a few more contacts. If there are any we (or the mayor's office) can reach out to now, that would be great.

They Mayor's event is going to involve the mayor, Brave New Films, ideally you all, and community groups doing a press conference and screening of the film. Details are still being worked out, but it will be sometime that late afternoon/evening. As of now, it will be at PACE University.

Thanks so much for your help with this.

Hi Regina,

I gave your team the names we had a while ago...the week after the initial 'ask' from John. I believe there were two that wanted to participate in the documentary. Did none of them work out? I believe Lynne Yabroudi was very keen.

Most of our members are away on summer break but I'll loop in Karen Alford & Ellie to see if they have any ideas re reach out for kindergarten teachers. We may have better luck later on in August when our members return from the summer vacation & perhaps we can connect with a kindergarten teacher then & still meet your need. Can you forward details re the Mayor's event on Sept 10th? I don't have that.

I'll be away for the first weeks of August but hopefully we can find someone for September. Thnx, Best, Maureen

August 18, 2015

Dear Mayor de Blasio,

On behalf of the Global Poverty Project, it is my pleasure to extend to you a special invitation to invite you and the First Lady back for a second year to address the Global Citizen Festival on the Great Lawn in Central Park, New York, on Saturday, September 26th.

The Global Citizen Festival is an action-rewarded, advocacy driven free music festival working towards ending extreme poverty where fans engage with causes in order to win tickets. This year's festival is being headlined by Pearl Jam, Beyonce, Ed Sheeran and Coldplay. The Secretary-General of the United Nations, President of the World Bank, and various Heads of Government attended last year's event, which was broadcast to over 40 million people, and secured over 2 billion online and offline media impressions.

The 2015 Global Citizen Festival will coincide with the announcement of the new UN Sustainable Development Goals,. These goals provide the roadmap to ending extreme poverty by 2030. Our goal is to make these Global Goals famous throughout the world and inspire citizens to take action, holding leaders accountable for their delivery.

This year's Festival will enjoy unprecedented global exposure. In addition to the ongoing attendance of the UN Secretary-General and President of the World Bank, NBC and MSNBC will provide live and pre-recorded coverage in the lead up to and during the Global Citizen Festival and YouTube will livestream the festival worldwide.

With the Festival now in its fourth year, New York City has shown its dedication to hosting this global event. As such, we would be honoured if you addressed the Festival and joined in the clarion call of a world without extreme poverty by 2030.

We look forward to hearing from you, and to welcoming you to this year's Global Citizen Festival.

Yours Sincerely

Hugh Evans
Chief Executive Officer
Global Poverty Project

Hey,

Am back in the office.....Please know that I've circulated this request several times to the appropriate internals but unfortunately it's a very slow time with most of our members away for the summer break. Our school year does not commence until Wednesday, September 9th so most of our folks are still away. FYI, We've got a staff retreat on August 31st and perhaps we'll have better luck for names of interested kindergarten teachers then. I've placed a call/email to Lynn Yabroudi, a kindergarten special ed teacher, who initially was very interested but I haven't heard anything back. It does seem strange that none of the teachers contacted were interested in participating but we've had a lot going on in NYC re evaluations & testing. Perhaps folks just got caught up in that.

My understanding is that no one internally is aware of any event with the Mayor in September re this project but please keep in mind that the first few days of school are particularly hectic and our members will be in their respective schools. It would be helpful if we had the logistics of the event as soon as possible. Goes without saying that I'll keep working this until our retreat...
Best, Maureen

Hi John & Maureen -

I am following up on this one last time.

It would be VERY helpful to have NY kindergarten teacher in the film and for the event in NY.

Now that school is back in in many places, are there a few you can connect us to this week?

We need them asap to film them, edit the piece, and have it ready for the event.

Let us know – thanks,

Hi Maureen -

Thanks for the quick response. We reached out to all of the teachers you gave us info for, but only two responded and neither were ultimately willing to participate.

Thus, we would LOVE a few more contacts. If there are any we (or the mayor's office) can reach out to now, that would be great.

They Mayor's event is going to involve the mayor, Brave New Films, ideally you all, and community groups doing a press conference and screening of the film. Details are still being worked out, but it will be sometime that late afternoon/evening. As of now, it will be at PACE University.

Thanks so much for your help with this.

Hi Regina,

I gave your team the names we had a while ago...the week after the initial 'ask' from John. I believe there were two that wanted to participate in the documentary. Did none of them work out? I believe Lynne Yabroudi was very keen.

Most of our members are away on summer break but I'll loop in Karen Alford & Ellie to see if they have any ideas re reach out for kindergarten teachers. We may have better luck later on in August when our members return from the summer vacation & perhaps we can connect with a kindergarten teacher then & still meet your need. Can you forward details re the Mayor's event on Sept 10th? I don't have that.

I'll be away for the first weeks of August but hopefully we can find someone for September. Thnx, Best, Maureen

Our headliners this year are Pearl Jam, Beyonce, Ed Sheeran and Coldplay along with our celebrity co-hosts Hugh Jackman, Stephen Colbert, Salma Hayek, Kerry Washington, and Olivia Wilde. We are also expecting UN Secretary General, the President of the World Bank and numerous heads of state.

It would be greatly appreciated if you could please pass this along to his scheduling team and let us know if he accepts.

I look forward to hearing from you.

We've got a comms plan to present to him tomorrow. However, I do NOT think we want to do a roundtable or speech prior to Mindy's data analysis which will not be ready till October. In addition any nuance will get lost in the noise right now. We have robust push back and can do announcements on stuff and things. But the larger conversation has to wait in my opinion

Subject: Homelessness

As I've said before, I propose we go the offensive on homelessness. A roundtable, a speech and/or a report asap. Dispel the myths and lay out our larger vision. Show what we're doing with affordable housing plan, safe havens, more nypd enforcement of quality of life, ending encampments, mental health efforts, etc. Need a proposal on this to be discussed thurs night

Homeless Communications Strategy

Background: As anticipated, the summer has seen a spike in coverage of street homelessness and concerns about so-called “quality of life” as a result.

While the vast majority of homeless are sheltered (averaging 56K), nearly 4000 individuals continue to live on the streets. Summer months are known to have an increased presence of street homeless for a variety of reasons that include warmer temperatures, closed schools and sweeps of the subway system.

We also know New Yorkers are encountering “sheltered” but unoccupied individuals (e.g., those that have a place at night but who hang out on the streets during daytime) and conflating it with street homelessness.

As DHS sites more shelters in neighborhoods we can anticipate more coverage questioning the City’s approach to the homeless epidemic.

Currently we are averaging a minimum of 2-3 stories per week focused on resident concerns about homelessness.

In October/November, the administration will unveil a new data-driven approach to street homelessness, shelters and social service provision to improve the quality-of-life for all New Yorkers. This report will level-set the causes and factors that contribute to homelessness within the income inequality framework.

Communications Strategy

Given the heightened --- and often sensationalized ---- focus on homelessness, we propose a two-phased approach.

The first phase is designed to push aggressively that the Mayor and City is focused on the challenge and addressing it head on. This is done visually (e.g. “encampment sweeps”) as well as through clear, direct policy and messaging (e.g. “the mental health policy/hubs”). Broaden our housing plan discussion to connect the dots.

The second phase begins once we start to see a decline in the street homelessness, or at least the perception of it. This is anticipated to occur in late September after school has begun and the temperatures begin to cool. During this portion, we can begin to frame a more nuanced conversation about the complexity of homelessness and our multi-faceted, data-driven approach. The current environment is too noisy to allow for this

- Ongoing (effective immediately): Increased push back on bogus claims of NYC returning to 80’s, including background briefings, myth vs. facts docs/tweets/video; validator deployment (expanded list of validators with clear asks); pushing of success former-homeless stories; strategic engagement of editorial board meetings.

Simultaneously we will push our housing work. Examples – partnership with Public Advocate and Agencies to take on repeat watchlist offenders; tenant protection programs to prevent evictions; know your rights sessions

- Calendared (starting next week): The next two weeks, and until back to school, aggressive engagement with reporters on the work the City is doing to address the homelessness and to demonstrate swift, clear leadership in heated environment; followed by a steady drum-beat of homeless-related announcements that will begin with a major housing-for-the-homeless plan, including the launch of a major NYNY4 campaign. Two-phased approach:

Phase 1: Immediate (August – late September):

Week of 9/1:

- Limited media access to Mayor's visits to sweeping camps, followed by paper announcement of ongoing the Homeless Encampment initiative
- Follow up: 1-on-1 interview with Mayor visiting DHS war room (show maps of hot spots and encampments + explain operation)
- AARP teletownhall: Discuss senior housing and housing insecurity seniors feel and our steps to protect
- Housing bill signing in community: Tenant Harassment – connect prevention evictions with tackling homeless problem

Week of 9/7 (before back-to-school):

- Announcement of Safe Havens beds with clergy* and SEPS – Special Exit and Prevention Supplement ($10M) Prevention and relocation. Announce new rental assistance for 1,000 single adults with rapid rehousing assistance based on national mode.
- Announcement of new street/subway homeless ads. Possible messages (very rough):
 - Help us address homelessness: Call 311 if someone needs help or exhibits dangerous behavior.
 - Help us address homelessness: Call 311 if you see an encampment.
 - Help us address homelessness: Tell a friend in need about homeless prevention programs.
 - Help us address homelessness: Participate in City-sponsored rental assistance programs.

Week of 9/21 (Pope week)

- Announce housing partnership with the Catholic Church in honor of Pope Francis visit
- Engagement of faith leaders on issues of income inequality--- utilize voices online and in media to shame folks for sensationalizing and dehumanizing while the City looks for real long-term solutions

Phase Two (mid-September – December)

After back to school, major housing-for-the-homeless announcement. Rollout includes salon-style discussion with Freakonomics reporter, or Paul Krugman on income inequality, homelessness and the new way New York is approaching the challenge. Think 92nd street Y talk. Ed boards. Online push

Week of 9/28

- Major announcement:
 - support for 30,000 supportive housing units in NYC over 10 years and commit City's traditional share with challenge to the State to join as a partner (implement by half new units and half scattered site rentals)
 - 10% (10K) set-aside for Housing Plan units
 - Converting 2,000 cluster shelter units to permanent housing for families
 - Expansion of shelter and assistance for DV survivors (in single women's system)
 - Expanded rapid rehousing assistance to help access previously allocated rental assistance for families (1000 single adults/ 1000 FWC]
- 30K Unity rally (organized by allies)
- (T) Announce litigation against the State for failure to set a rental allowance supplement that is based on the reasonable cost of housing, which is a major driver of homelessness (mid late sep)

October

- Announcement of Mental Health Road Map
- Salon-style release of Operations analysis and public one-on-one thought leadership sit-down with Mayor.

Week of 11/11 (Veterans Day)

- Launch countdown to end veterans homelessness

December

- Announce end of veteran homelessness
- Visit a family who has been relocated from shelter to permanent housing and announce total number of shelter exits

Mr Zero Percent? I think we could laugh off Pataki and use Trump's own words. Homelessness - could pivot to our vision for tackling encampments for those without mental illness.

In a word, there were always be a reason to duck and cover. Local press will always be attacking us on something. We should see these national appearances as an opportunity to move beyond local filter - just like with new media.

On the other hand, it would be warmly received if we said some good things about some folks this week.

I would be in favor. Everyone is talking about our issues - we should seize. National folks don't care about gym and BB gun stories. That's local stuff.

George would want to discuss the economy, the 2016 field, some local NY topics (if that's of interest) and any news of the week that comes up and is relevant to the Mayor.

Hi Andrea,
Sorry that I was not able to follow up yesterday – I was out of the office. Do you think that next Sunday might be a possibility? We've been wanting to do this for months. It would be great if it finally worked out.
Thank you,

Hi Andrea,

I hope you're doing well. I wanted to check in and see if we could perhaps finally make something work. We'd love to have Mayor De Blasio join George on set in New York on Sunday September 6th, Labor Day weekend. Could we discuss tomorrow or early next week? I'll give you a call.

All my best,

Here's a working draft.

It's got policy holes that need patching, and needs to be cut a bunch.

It also needs fleshing out of some things that currently exist as placeholders. That which I can do without additional policy input, like Comp Sci, I WILL do before Mayor meeting, as well as writing up full conclusion.

Talk to you all about it at 8:45.

Education Vision 2015: Updated August 25, 2015

Equity and Excellence: Every Day, Every Step of the Way

Last Wednesday, 1.1 million children put another New York City summer behind them and started the school year.

Could you feel that tidal wave of emotion crash over the whole City, as it always does on that first day? So much joy, excitement, trepidation abounded on sidewalks, in hallways and lobbies, in cars and buses and trains ferrying families to schools in neighborhoods from the South Bronx to the South Shore.

I know those emotions well, because for a very long time, Chirlane and I were those public school parents. This is actually the first September in 17 years we haven't been among those waving goodbye at the entrance, swallowing all those feelings as [REDACTED] walked away into the school year.

We know that families of every kind, in all neighborhoods, share those feelings. But, for many, the common experience of education stops there.

Maybe, once all the parents finally left, a teacher in one school took his new charges to tour a gleaming greenhouse, while a few miles away a teacher was forced to shuffle desks so the leaky roof overhead wouldn't drip down on students. Maybe one XX and another YY.

But one set of kids is no more deserving of a greenhouse or a leaking roof than any other. Each is owed the opportunity to have their future determined by hard work and unique talents, as it should be.

For too many, however, economic futures will be defined by the economic pasts of their neighborhoods. This status quo is unacceptable, un-American, and unfaithful to the legacy and to the promise of New York City.

We all have a stake in its change. As taxpayers, we all pay for public school. As Americans, its value is entrenched in our moral DNA. We've inherited a belief so strong it's almost biological: that this land's richness and riches derive from the success of its people—and this success is available to anyone who puts in the time and the sweat to earn it. Not the privilege of a few, but the right of all.

Public education is mandated by law because it is how this core American value should come to life. It's obvious and it's inevitable, it's what makes this country great: our children must go to school, there will always be a school for them to go to, and that school will be a springboard to success for each child.

In other words, equity and excellence are the twin engines of system. But in our schools today, these engines aren't running. Our system has been rife with division, and students have paid the price.

The Tale of Two Cities in our schools is unacceptable. But we believe it is NOT inevitable.

That's one fundamental difference between this administration's vision and past blueprints for how to improve our schools: our vision is anchored by a fundamental belief in our children – in every child. We won't choose among our children who will succeed and who will not.

We believe that every student has both the ability and the right to awaken their minds to the world, to set forth on their journey with the skills, courage and confidence to reach their full potential. Every child can grow into a successful adult—ready for college, ready for life—if their education gives them the right tools.

Over the past 18 months, we have forged those tools. They are powerful instruments of equity and excellence, for our schools and for our students—every day, every step of the way.

Let there be no mistake: the “way” I speak of leads to and includes college. I often say that education determines economic destiny more now than at any point in human history.

Nowhere is that clearer than when looking at the way a life veers towards success when a person completes college. An adult with only a HS diploma is almost three times as likely to be in poverty in NYC as someone with a bachelor's degree or higher, and makes $1.1 million less over the course of a lifetime. [Source: CEO]

And NYC's success as a 21st century global city depends on students' success in higher education. Our children are counting on us, but we are counting on THEM to keep our city the most competitive in the world. Our economy needs 60% more college graduates [NEED HARD #] by 2020 to keep growing at its full potential. By that time, two-thirds [65% -- NEED HARD #] of NYC jobs are projected to require some college.

We have set three connected goals around higher education to lift up more of our children and meet the needs of a growing, thriving city.

Our first goal is to graduate more of our kids from high school – ensuring at least 75% graduate, within four years, by 2020. That will mean an extra 5,000 graduates each year—or more—from 2020 on. [up from 68% – WHAT ARE THE HARD #S??]

The second is doubling the number of those graduates who are college- and career-ready to 50,000 a year (66%) by 2025.

And today I am proud to represent the first city in the country to set a college completion goal for our students. Our third goal is to increase by 50% the number of DOE graduates completing college [by 2030]. Because making it through high school isn't the end of the journey. Entering college isn't either. Finishing college is what it takes to buoy a person's fortunes.

Today I will clarify the vision of how we get there: how our an equal commitment to both equity and excellence had yielded core principles that in turn are animating our work in schools.

We are of course already hard at work. Some of our efforts are visible throughout the city, like UPK. Others are underway, and we'll shine a light on them today. And still others you will soon hear about for the very first time.

Fundamentally, we know that no two schools and no two children need the same support in order to excel.

Each school needs varying support in what they teach, who's teaching it, who's leading the school, how welcome parents are and even what it feels like to be inside the school itself (the areas that comprise our Framework for Great Schools).

And each child will travel his or her own academic, social, and emotional journey. We can't, in the interest of wholesale success, sell education wholesale to all students. They're not our customers. They're our children.

As a parent, it can be a real struggle to find what works for YOUR child and hold on to it. The system is vast and its possibilities and points of decision seem endless. . .making the potential to get lost or left behind much too real. We want our students and families to know that we will not let that happen. We are there for the long haul. We are ending the era of families ricocheting around inside a mammoth bureaucracy. [INSERT EXAMPLE OF SOMETHING WE'VE ALREADY DONE?]

So: we are giving children and families a hand to hold [from pre-K until they graduate from high school]—a “single shepherd” to guide families through the journey, through the landscape of teachers and tests, someone to help clear the tough hurdles and celebrate strong successes.

[Each family will connect to their [SHEPHERD] as soon as their child enters public school. And in middle school, the [SHEPHERD] will develop the Student's Progress Pact, a living contract among our students, families, teachers, and school leaders. It will outline how each student will reach the goal of graduating from high school, making it to college, and succeeding all the way through.]

Let's imagine a few points on that journey for some of our children, across the city, over the course of their day.

We'll start first thing in the morning. It's 8am, and a four year-old is intently focused on building a tower of blocks, carefully stacking as her classmates play behind her – some singing with a teacher, some drawing early masterpieces, some gazing at beginner books. It's a lively and alive place, filled with the sounds and colors that awaken young children to the world.

This is the critical moment where success begins. We fundamentally believe all children must start their education earlier so they are poised to reap the benefits of kindergarten – and everything that comes after.

I'll repeat what I've said before: we cannot get education right if we do not get it right from the beginning. I'm very proud that last week, we started getting it right for 70,000 of our kids. They began our free, universal, high-quality pre-K. Block towers are rising all across this great city.

Around the same time, across the city, a second grader rides the bus to school with a parent, proudly showing off the book the class has been reading—explaining what it's about and which character she was chosen to play in a class activity yesterday. Her parent smiles and plays along—the second grader doesn't know that yesterday her parent and her teacher actually spoke about it on the phone. The teacher called for a few minutes—just to let her know that the student did a great job.

It's nearly impossible to overemphasize the value of these kinds of interaction—both the simple phone call from teacher to parent, and the moment of sharing between child and parent. Parents are the first and last teachers of children, and must be our partners.

That's why we knocked on thousands of doors this summer to make sure families knew what to expect in the year ahead. It's why we instituted an unprecedented 40 minutes of teacher time dedicated solely to connecting with parents. Maybe this is the time during which our imaginary teacher made her phone call to share news that doesn't just mean the world to the family, but also to all of us and all the educators. . .

Because one second grader's proud announcement that he or she read lines in a class activity is one step closer to our new goal of universal literacy for ALL second graders. Our goal is to have every single second grader reading on grade level. And, by 2017, to make sure every parent of a K-2 child knows their kid's reading progress. We know that when parents know how their child is doing, they help their child do better.

This may sound ambitious—many other places hold 3rd grade as their reading standard. But the research is in. Kids who can read at grade level by the time they walk into their third grade classroom for the first time do [X BETTER – NEED TO QUANTIFY].

And we don't shy away from ambitious standards. Aiming high is a core principle—and simply part of who we are. We are making sure all of our schools aim high in every way they can. New York has the most rigorous curriculum standards and administers the toughest tests in the nation.

We expect everyone to aim high and we are giving everyone what they need to do so. RIFF ON “FOR ALL; NEWS ON COMP SCI FOR ALL

And that phone call from teacher to parent is hugely important for understanding how our student is doing against that curriculum. Yes, our tests are tough. But we treat tests as an important thing, not THE important thing. Tests only tell you that you need to improve and where that improvement is needed—not how to get it done. That's where committed and talented teachers are necessary for success.

A few hours later, it's noon, and we see an eighth grader hunched over an algebra book in the library. She finally solves $A^2 + B^2 = C^2$, sits back in wonder, and glances up at the clock to see how many minutes are left till her advisory session, when she can tell her adviser how hard it was—and how it feels to finally get it.

Our student been struggling with a lot of anger, frustration, and sadness this year, and her adviser's office has been her sanctuary. They talk for an hour, and then the adviser sends our student home with a family permission form to participate in a big day next week: a college tour. She'll be the first in her family to see the inside of a college classroom.

Middle school is a deeply important time. It's when an actual vision of success as an adult – college, a career—can come into focus. . .if we show it to our students. And it's when we must equip our children with what they need in every dimension—academically, socially and emotionally—to ultimately make the vision a reality.

That is our goal: every middle school student will be socially, emotionally, and academically ready for high school, and exposed to college by the time they enter 9th grade.

Academically, we have zeroed in on one of the key skills that students need to stay on pace to get to college: algebra. Research shows it [WHAT ARE THE IMPROVEMENTS?], but students at lower-performing schools have been locked out of this because the schools do not offer it. But that's in the past. The future for our kids and our city is Algebra for All. Every school in this city will offer algebra to their students as a central part of their preparation for high school and for life.

We won't relegate ANY of our kids to dreaming about where aiming high can get them. Starting in middle school, we'll show them. We have already committed to getting 100,000 kids internships, mentorships, summer jobs by 2025—including our most vulnerable children in foster homes and shelter. We are doubling down on that today: every middle and high school will have a business partner [EXPLAIN WHAT THIS IS/DOES]. And also beginning in middle school, every student will be taken on NYC college tours multiple times. By seeing what a career and college is. . .

These middle years can be tremendously hard for many kids, and for their families. All this ambition, all these skills, will take root if and only if our kids are socially and emotionally ready for these experiences, and what's to come with the rigors of high school. And that's not easy for a lot of our kids, who are battling tough situations at home, or among their friends, or just through the difficulties of growing up.

My wife, Chirlane, has been paying special attention to the mental health needs of our kids. She's working with my Administration to revolutionize how we deal with mental health in this city, especially for those with the greatest need and the fewest options. You'll hear a lot more about that in the near future.

These battles can interfere with learning. And we are determined, as a City, to break down all barriers to learning so children come to school ready to succeed. We must fulfill our children's basic prerequisites to learning – they must be nourished. They must be able to see the blackboard. They must be [SOMETHING ELSE].

This drove us to create 130 Community Schools across the city—places that address the needs of the whole child. They might provide counseling services so that students like our 8th grader have a safe place to share her struggles and successes alike. They offer free vision exams and glasses so kids can see the blackboard. They might have a food pantry. They might offer English classes for families so parents can help kids with their homework.

ADD: Expand afterschool programs for all middle school students, providing nurturing and academic focus that middle school students need

Time is passing: it's 3:30pm, and a tenth grader runs her fingers over the pages of her ELA workbook. As a recent immigrant, she needs to pass the English Regents workbook. As a recent immigrant, she needs to pass the English Regents to graduate—so her school staff has created this extended learning period for her and the 15 other English Language Learners in the class.

Each year, 20,000 students who begin high school in New York City do not finish. Most of those students are from the schools that have historically struggled the most. These schools are among the 94 that we are revolutionizing as Renewal Schools. We are transforming the experience of both learning and working in these schools—and the lives of the kids and families who are part of them. Renewal School students are getting an extra hour of instruction, like our English Language Learner.

RENEWAL SCHOOLS ARE WORKING – HERE’S EVIDENCE

She, like all students, will need to aim high to achieve her full potential. For too long, we haven’t even given students the chance to aim high in high school, because they haven’t been offered the chance to do advanced work—a chance that, when taken, correlates with success [getting into and through college coursework]. You can’t shoot for the moon if there’s no rocket to take you there.

That ends-- today. Today we offer the chance to aim high and achieve high. We are introducing AP for All: Every school will offer Advanced Placement classes.

[TRANSITION]

Now it’s 5pm. A recent graduate comes home from her summer job. She’s done it—the days and nights of hard work, struggles and ultimately victories have earned her admission to college [CUNY?]. Money is tight for her, as it is for so many in this city. So maybe she’s working at a fast food restaurant, or cleaning hotel rooms to get by. She arrives home to a letter from her university. It’s her fall semester reading list. Total price of textbooks: $600. She freezes.

Each year, 20,000 of the City’s high school graduates do not enter college. They fall victim to the phenomenon of “summer melt,” where their ability or confidence to begin college in September simply melts away due to unexpected or onerous expenses, or paperwork, or simply uncertainty about how it could all possible work.

But WE are here to declare that neither finances, fear, or the unfamiliar will be a barrier to education and a life of success for our children. And we will not stop our work to break these barriers at graduation.

We are giving our students every support they need – including financial help for the things both in plain sight and hiding in the shadows, like textbooks.

We're doubling down on mentoring and advisement. [YMI, HS counselors?]

And we are establishing for every child a college savings account, putting aside $50 for every child put aside the moment they enter our education system. [DETAILS]. This would transform the experience of our student confronted with hundreds of dollars in books. She wouldn't be cowed. She wouldn't freeze. She'd know it's there, and she's draw on her savings account and buy her books.

The sun is behind the skyline and it's 8:30pm. After a morning spent at a part-time job and classes all afternoon and into the evening, a college sophomore enters the subway and carefully puts away her Metrocard. At the right stop, she runs up the stairs and greets her study group inside a public library. They've ridden the train stations all over the City in order to be able to meet in one place and study for the next day's exam.

We'll be getting more of our kids who graduate high school into college. But it's not enough to get them to college. We've got to get them through it. And right now, 17,000 students of our students who begin college do not finish—an unacceptable situation.

Our student got her Metrocard through a CUNY program called ASAP. ASAP kids are given the support they need to succeed in every dimension. A Metrocard to get to class. A designated cohort of students they travel with through the four years to provide peer support. The program works: [EVIDENCE]. And it is now a national model, replicated in places like [XYZ].

That's why we are scaling it up, investing $Xm to get Y more grads into ASAP seats and through college. [METRICS/DESCRIPTION/TIMELINE]

And we're introing new interventions to battle the mindset and paperwork and overwhelm of being in college. These include improving advisement/mentoring – mindset interventions, Low-cost reminders to help stay on top of academic career – text messages, emails

- Helping kids reapply for FAFSA

The night ends, the sun rises, and it's 8 a.m., the next day. A college senior grabs her buzzing phone off the kitchen table. It's lighting up with text messages from her mother, her single shepherd, the manager at the internship she just finished – all variations on “Go get ‘em!” She smiles and puts it in her purse, then turns to face her reflection in a mirror. She smooths her lapels, takes a deep breath, and catches the elevator right before the doors close. She's on the way out the door for a job interview.

GOAL: 50% more DOE grads with college degrees by 2020.

CONCLUSION

IDEAS:

Be accountable for the journey and the destination.

Schools are accountable to us not just for test scores and grad rates, but for the rigorous instruction, collaborative teachers, supportive environments, strong family-community ties, effective school leaders, and trust that improve those scores and rates. This is the Framework for Great Schools. Research shows it works.

We—City leaders, school leaders, teachers, parents—are all accountable to our students. Student Progress Pact.

We (gov't) are accountable to New Yorkers for our schools' overall successes and difficulties alike.

We are giving more information for parents and all NYers on how schools are doing, where they need help, what that help looks like.

/END SPEECH/

NEEDS TO BE WORKED IN:

NEED:

- It will take us all – conclusion? Rallying slogan?
- PROSE
- Increase the number of CTE programs – NEED INFO.
 - CTE students are more likely to graduate high school than their non CTE student counterparts – and have better outcomes for young male students of color
- Results of what we've done so far – Renewal school stats and stories
- Section on relationship with educators. . .below needs edit

We must work with educators, not against them. They will carry out all of this work. We must value educators' expertise and show respect for the hard work they do every day. We must work harder to retain them, and provide training they need to deepen their skills.

This professional development is a cornerstone of our reforms in every grade, and something the Chancellor speaks about with particular passion. The core of this is spreading what works and connecting the whole system. Veteran educators are helping fellow teachers and principals improve, spreading success throughout the system.

But not all teachers should be in a learning environment. Because we fundamentally believe in making the change that's necessary, we have already removed 700+ teachers, replace school leadership, or transform a school itself when they cannot improve with our tailored and targeted support.

And we have brought educators along with us in this. We are showing them a new level of respect and also making the change that is necessary.

Two great opportunities to help TPA get back up and running leading into the forum. Both would help further the local work you're doing on income inequality and give us something to push out nationally.

We're in the process of putting together the September and October message calendar (including the forum). I would like sign off to move forward giving them times. TPA would handle both directly:

1. Chris Hayes still would like to interview with MBDB. He would like to do an extended interview with him. 30-45 minutes. It could be in studio or a walk and talk. The main subject: income inequality and his tenure. Timeline: MID SEPTEMBER.

From Chris:

"The Mayor and I should an extended interview"..."yes, but also: EVERYTHING. Like, I'm a better, fairer, better read interlocutor on his entire tenure so far than a lot of the idiocy I'm seeing, and say this as someone who (like everyone) has more than my fair share of criticisms of the Mayor."

2. Sirius interview with Ari Havt Rabin Sirius- the letter below is the invite and the topic: TPA, specifically income inequality. He could highlight his bona fides and work in the city. TIMELINE: OCTOBER

SiriusXM Progress would like to host a special event featuring Mayor Bill De Blasio to highlight his work promoting the progressive agenda. This exclusive event would take place in the Fall at the SiriusXM's studios in New York City. The town hall-style event would feature Mayor De Blasio taking questions from host Ari Rabin-Havt and an intimate studio audience comprised of New York City SiriusXM subscribers.

SiriusXM's event with Mayor Bill De Blasio is part of SiriusXM's ongoing effort to have iconic figures and entertainers sitting down with studio audiences comprised of SiriusXM listeners. Previous SiriusXM specials have featured Vice President Al Gore, Senator Kristen Gillibrand, Cardinal Timothy Dolan, Senator Tom Harkin, Senator Olympia Snowe, Bruce Springsteen, Bud Selig, Harry Belafonte, Taylor Swift and many others.

After the broadcast on SiriusXM, the discussion with Mayor De Blasio will be available on SiriusXM On Demand for subscribers listening via the SiriusXM Internet Radio App for smartphones and other mobile devices or online at siriusxm.com.

SiriusXM is the world's largest radio broadcaster measured by revenue and has more than 27 million subscribers. SiriusXM creates and broadcasts commercial-free music; premier sports talk and live events; comedy; news; exclusive talk and entertainment; and the most comprehensive Latin music, sports and talk programming in radio.

I understand where we are trying to go but want to flag that we have placed this new slogan- strong schools, strong communities all over the city. It's on all lit and on all of our new borough support centers.

Whatever change we make, I would like to somehow incorporate this phrase.

Dom helped make sure this part-time nurse who is 6 months pregnant got her car back.

Basically, she filed stolen car report for her car and it was towed and pd fucked up and didn't tell her and then she couldn't afford to get car back bc months in lot = $$$

Abc came to us and dom made pd pay for it and got this woman her car back.

Can we say something along the lines of "whenever a staff member receives a complaint from any constituent, we follow up to see how we can assist and solve their problem."

Ms. Parikh,

Ms. Parchment is picking up her car today. She won't have to pay a cent, the NYPD, I'm told, paid the bill.

Should I/she be thanking you and the mayor's office?

I'm just wondering what was the catalyst.

This story will air today at 5:30pm... of course, we will include this resolution.

Best,
Steve

As I stated before... At DCPI, I gave you the press person to speak to there, Lt. Grimpel... He said the police dropped the ball, but could do nothing and advised she hire a lawyer and contact the comptroller's office. The comptroller's press contact told me she has to file a claim, just like everyone else. That will take months and she will likely lose her car to an auction by the tow yard.

In my tenure here, I've never gotten so many doors slammed in my face in a single report, (especially after a city agency admitted screwing up). It's really been an incredible exercise in futility. And, right now, that will be the focus of our story. But, our story hasn't been written yet. And I still have faith that someone, anyone at the city will do something to help this part time nurse.

I understand you have to check my information... but if everything I've said is true, can the mayor's office help this lady? Or will she have to go through the comptroller's office, wait months, and likely watch helplessly as her car will eventually be auctioned off by the tow yard.

Yep, I checked in with folks on Friday but working through press offices and as you mentioned it's multiple agencies, so trying to run this down.

Apologies for delay.

Groups Press Hillary Clinton to Take On Wall Street's Revolving Door With Government

Eight groups hoping to press Hillary Rodham Clinton to address Wall Street excesses released a letter on Wednesday urging her to focus on the issue of “golden parachute” compensation packages for Wall Street executives who go on to take government jobs.

The issue is one that has been pushed by Senator Elizabeth Warren, the Massachusetts Democrat who Democracy for America and MoveOn.org want to run for president. The progressive groups have become more vocal as the presidential nominating contest has gone on, and they are seeking to push Mrs. Clinton to the left to combat what they call Wall Street's excesses, in this case financial executives who take government jobs, where they can use their power to benefit the private sector.

“Americans are sick and tired of the Wall-Street-to-Washington revolving door, and are looking for a presidential candidate who will take concrete steps to fight it,” said Kurt Walters, said campaign manager of Rootstrikers, one of the groups that signed the letter. “Secretary Clinton hasn't yet shown that she is that candidate, but we hope her responses to these questions will demonstrate she shares these progressive priorities.”

A spokesman for Mrs. Clinton declined to comment.

Quick question:

We are going to be sending out invitations for this event. How should we reference Robert?

Was thinking the language would be something along the lines of "Mayor Bill de Blasio cordially invites you to a screening and discussion with Filmmaker Robert Greenwald" and then list name of the movie, etc.

But open to suggestions on how to word it, and please let me know if we should list Robert differently!

Can you coordinate with Maureen to have at 3-5 teachers at the event? This will be key.

We no longer have time to add anyone to the film.

Thanks!

Hey,

Am back in the office.....Please know that I've circulated this request several times to the appropriate internals but unfortunately it's a very slow time with most of our members away for the summer break. Our school year does not commence until Wednesday, September 9th so most of our folks are still away. FYI, We've got a staff retreat on August 31st and perhaps we'll have better luck for names of interested kindergarten teachers then. I've placed a call/email to Lynn Yabroudi, a kindergarten special ed teacher, who initially was very interested but I haven't heard anything back. It does seem strange that none of the teachers contacted were interested in participating but we've had a lot going on in NYC re evaluations & testing. Perhaps folks just got caught up in that.

My understanding is that no one internally is aware of any event with the Mayor in September re this project but please keep in mind that the first few days of school are particularly hectic and our members will be in their respective schools. It would be helpful if we had the logistics of the event as soon as possible. Goes without saying that I'll keep working this until our retreat...Best,
Maureen

Hi John & Maureen -

I am following up on this one last time.

It would be VERY helpful to have NY kindergarten teacher in the film and for the event in NY.

Now that school is back in in many places, are there a few you can connect us to this week?

We need them asap to film them, edit the piece, and have it ready for the event.

Let us know – thanks,

Regina

Hi Maureen -

Thanks for the quick response. We reached out to all of the teachers you gave us info for, but only two responded and neither were ultimately willing to participate.

Thus, we would LOVE a few more contacts. If there are any we (or the mayor's office) can reach out to now, that would be great.

They Mayor's event is going to involve the mayor, Brave New Films, ideally you all, and community groups doing a press conference and screening of the film. Details are still being worked out, but it will be sometime that late afternoon/evening. As of now, it will be at PACE University.

Thanks so much for your help with this.

Hi Regina,

I gave your team the names we had a while ago...the week after the initial 'ask' from John. I believe there were two that wanted to participate in the documentary. Did none of them work out? I believe Lynne Yabroudi was very keen.

Most of our members are away on summer break but I'll loop in Karen Alford & Ellie to see if they have any ideas re reach out for kindergarten teachers. We may have better luck later on in August when our members return from the summer vacation & perhaps we can connect with a kindergarten teacher then & still meet your need. Can you forward details re the Mayor's event on Sept 10th? I don't have that.

I'll be away for the first weeks of August but hopefully we can find someone for September. Thnx, Best, Maureen

Hey Robert. So sorry for the delay on my end - but I was able to track down the perfect person for you - Maureen Salter at the United Federation of Teachers here in NYC.

I know your shooter is done for this week - but Maureen is eager to help track down some Kindergarten teachers who would fit the bill & could help coordinate for your shooter's next availability.

Let me know how I can help - but otherwise, I'll let you guys take it from here!

Subject: Education speech/ introductions

Sir, Ma'am

I wanted to begin a discussion with you about the stagecraft of the speech on September 16. Unfortunately I have to leave at 1pm today to take my son to the pediatrician, so starting discussion here for others to pick up on in case our speech meeting goes long. We should begin outreach quickly to lock in our intro.

Introduction:

First choice: Neil de Grasse Tyson

<!--[if !supportLists]--> <!--[endif]-->I'd like to propose that we ask Neil deGrasse Tyson to introduce you for the speech. He went to public schools in NYC (Bronx Science), his children currently attend public schools. He is a huge advocate on STEM and we have many STEM type items in the speech (computer science, algebra for all, AP for all). In addition, I think if we were to secure him it would be a huge "get" both in terms of his name recognition (3.4 million twitter followers) but also because he has been critical of NYC public schools in the past, particularly the way schools have treated children of color.

He's very much against the way the education of young students has been undertaken generally, with, of course, with a particular interest in science education. Our computer science program speaks to this shift. Tyson routinely states that standardized testing is a misguided way to educate students. He also believes that lackluster teachers are also to blame for poor science education. Tyson has routinely stated that teachers who can fully engage students and get them excited about learning are the best teachers who will produce well-educated and interested students.

I believe you would need to make the call directly to him as he has turned down school speeches in the past, but those were commencement speeches and he has said he wants to see a vision for schools.

Second Choice: Sonia Sotomayor

<!--[if !supportLists]--> <!--[endif]-->Born and raised NYC. Brilliant. etc

Third Choice: Marian Wright Edelman

<!--[if !supportLists]--> <!--[endif]-->Speaks to issues of equity for all our kids. Thought leader. Not as popular name recognition as the other two.

We are identifying high schools for the speech (also considering CUNY but that brings a different set of discussion points) and finalizing a full communications plan including roll-ins, videos, validator outreach, DN editorial board meeting, etc. Rob, Kate, JDC and I are connecting on visuals for the speech--- Slogan banner, video to kick start, etc

Many thanks,
Andrea

As I stated before... At DCPI, I gave you the press person to speak to there, Lt. Grimpel... He said the police dropped the ball, but could do nothing and advised she hire a lawyer and contact the comptroller's office. The comptroller's press contact told me she has to file a claim, just like everyone else. That will take months and she will likely lose her car to an auction by the tow yard.

In my tenure here, I've never gotten so many doors slammed in my face in a single report, (especially after a city agency admitted screwing up). It's really been an incredible exercise in futility. And, right now, that will be the focus of our story. But, our story hasn't been written yet. And I still have faith that someone, anyone at the city will do something to help this part time nurse.

I understand you have to check my information... but if everything I've said is true, can the mayor's office help this lady? Or will she have to go through the comptroller's office, wait months, and likely watch helplessly as her car will eventually be auctioned off by the tow yard.

We were notified that Leslie could pick up her car the next morning. The NYPD stepped up and paid all the storage fees.

It was our calls to Mayor de Blasio that got results.

That made Leslie, very happy, "Thank you 7 On Your Side, anyone out there call Nina she could get it done," she said.

TOWING TROUBLES FOR BRONX WOMAN

ABC 7 – Nina Pineda – 5:50 pm

<http://abc7ny.com/news/towing-troubles-for-bronx-woman/958138/>

7 On Your Side spent nearly a month investigating this mystery; going to the NYPD, city agencies and a state assemblyman, trying to help a woman who's car first vanished, then surfaced at a tow yard a month later with a stack of charges.

For the past two months, expectant mother Leslie Parchment's been stuck taking the subway from the Bronx to her job as a Manhattan hospital nurse. She's been riding the rails ever since her car vanished from 235th Street where she says she parked it May 31st.

"I call the police and they look in the system and drove around with me for an hour and they said it's not in the system. So it's a grand larceny the car is gone." Leslie said.

Officers with the 47th Precinct filed a stolen car report on June 4th. But where was her car? The day she parked, it was ticketed (the ticket was later dismissed) and towed by the Bronx-based Crown Towing. But Leslie didn't find this out until she got a letter from Crown more than a month later. By now, the bill ballooned.

"It was already $1,600 dollars. And I said I don't have $1,600," Leslie said.

It wasn't until we investigated that we found the NYPD admitted dropping the ball. They knew that Leslie's car had been ticketed and towed but failed to tell the vehicle owner anything when she reported her car stolen to the police.

So we got involved. We asked for help from the city's Department of Finance, who referred us to the NYPD, they sent us to the Comptroller. We even appealed to the Public Advocate. That's when we threw a "hail Mary" to Mayor de Blasio's office. And just days later...

POLITICO - Gabriel DeBenedetti

Eight liberal political groups continue to pressure Hillary Clinton over her Wall Street policies on Wednesday, releasing a letter that asks whether she supports legislation to ban financial companies from giving workers large bonuses before they join the government. The letter specifically points to two of Clinton's State Department aides who came over from the banking world.

“On behalf of our nine million supporters across the country, we are writing to request more information about your positions regarding the revolving door between Wall Street and the federal government,” reads a statement backed by Democracy For America, Rootstrikers, CREDO Action, MoveOn.Org Political Action, the Center for Popular Democracy Action, The Other 98%, Friends of the Earth Action, and American Family Voices.

The missive, which comes as Clinton interrupts her Hamptons vacation to unveil her rural policy platform in Iowa on Wednesday, specifically notes that Clinton has yet to support or comment on Sen. Tammy Baldwin's Financial Services Conflict of Interest Act. Progressive icon Sen. Elizabeth Warren — who has ties to many of those who signed the letter — has encouraged all presidential candidates to back the legislation, as both Bernie Sanders and Martin O'Malley have done.

“These types of ‘golden parachute’ compensation packages are highly controversial, and for good reason,” the letter reads. “At worst, it results in undue and inappropriate corporate influence at the highest levels of government — in essence, a barely legal, backdoor form of bribery.”

The letter concludes by posing two questions to the Democratic front-runner: “Do you still support the use of this controversial compensation practice?” and “If you become president, will you allow officials who enter your administration to receive this sort of bonus?”

While Clinton has made steps to appeal to the types of progressive voters behind this letter, she has so far resisted pressure from the left to support reviving the Glass-Steagall Act, which separated commercial and investment banking before it was repealed in 1999. And members of these groups who wanted bank antagonist Warren to run for the presidency are on high alert this week after news broke that the Massachusetts senator met with Vice President Joe Biden over the weekend as he considers his own presidential ambitions.

“It’s hard to imagine Democrats’ 2016 nominee will be truly tough on Wall Street banks that break the law, if they won’t commit to banning their advisers from receiving legalized bribes from those same banks,” said Charles Chamberlain, executive director of Democracy for America, a group founded by former Vermont governor and current Clinton backer Howard Dean.

The letter names a pair of Clinton associates who moved from banks to the State Department: Robert Hormats, an undersecretary who came from Goldman Sachs, and Thomas Nides, a deputy secretary who came from Morgan Stanley.

Warren has suggested repeatedly that any candidate seeking her endorsement must agree not to appoint officials with Wall Street ties.

“Anyone who wants to be president should appoint only people who have already demonstrated they are independent, who have already demonstrated that they can hold giant banks accountable, who have already demonstrated that they embrace the kind of ambitious economic policies that we need to rebuild opportunity and a strong middle class in this country,” she said in July.

Call made to revisit state's minimum wage

CHICAGO TRIBUNE - Karen Caffarini

With take-home pay of about $200 a week from her minimum-wage job at a Highland gas station, Karina Longfellow finds herself having to decide which of her bills she can pay and which will have to wait a little while longer.

The creditors haven't started calling on the 22-year-old student at Purdue University Calumet yet, but she knows it could only be a matter of time.

"I have a lot of bills to pay, but it's kind of hard when you're only making $200 a week," said Longfellow, who is considered part-time but works between 35 and 40 hours a week.

She said she has earned more at other jobs in the past, but accepted this job and its $7.25 an hour salary with no benefits about a month and a half ago, when she found herself jobless and with only $30 to her name.

"I don't know how people with families can do it," she said of parents who work in minimum wage jobs.

Minimum wage movement underway

Families can't make it on their own making $7.25 an hour, Indiana's minimum wage, said state Sen. Karen Tallian, D-Ogden Dunes, who said she filed legislation to increase the rate for two or three years, but none of the bills received a hearing.

Still, Tallian said she'll try again this year. She said she'll be filing another bill, this time asking that the minimum wage in Indiana be increased to between $9 and $11.50 an hour.

Someone earning $7.25 an hour, which is also the federal minimum wage, makes just over $15,000 a year working 40-hour weeks. It's above the federal poverty level for a single person, but dips below for a household of two, at $15,730, and even further below for a family of four, which is $23,850.

"No one who works 40 hours a week should be below the federal poverty level," Tallian said.

She said in those cases the families would qualify for state benefits.

"The state of Indiana is subsidizing these businesses," she said.

Tallian isn't alone in looking at increasing minimum wage. Cities, states and companies themselves are making the move.

Wal-Mart said it would raise its minimum pay to $10 an hour by next year and Amalgamated Bank announced it raised its teller pay to $15 an hour. Chicago is raising its minimum wage to $13 an hour and Seattle, an expensive city in which to live, raised its to $15 an hour.

Minimum wage varies by state. Vermont voted to gradually increase its minimum wage to $10.50 by January 2018 and Washington, D.C., increased its to $11.50 as of July 2016.

A matter of timing

State Rep. Julie Olthoff, D-Merrillville, said she doesn't know if now is a good time to talk about minimum wage in Indiana, noting it was only six years since the last increase.

"A lot of businesses were hit in 2007 and 2008 and are just now bouncing back. Now they're faced with another challenge -- trying to figure out the Affordable Care Act and how they can handle it," Olthoff said.

She said some companies would put on more part-time workerers, which she said wouldn't be positive for the employee, employer or the business.

Paul McGrath, an economics professor at Purdue University Calumet, said it's probably time to look at the issue again in Indiana, even if the rate is only increased to $8 or $9, but added whether the General Assembly would do so would likely depend on whether it's mostly blue (Democrat) or red (Republican).

He doesn't see the minimum going as high as $10 an hour in Indiana. He said the state doesn't have the high cost of living that Chicago and Seattle do that drove their minimum rates higher.

He said how much of an impact raising the rate will have on a company's profitability depends on how important unskilled labor is to the company.

"If a company, municipality or university uses a lot of unskilled labor, it could have a cost impact, which they'd try to pass on to the customer. To what degree will customers agree to eat that cost," McGrath said.

"Some might ask why a meal costs 25 cents more than last week," he said.

McGrath said he's pretty sure there are a lot of service sector jobs in Northwest Indiana's seven-county region that start out at minimum wage, many of which are part-time.

Ross Township Trustee Joseph Shudick said his office sees, and serves, a lot of working poor residents, people making minimum wage working at two to three different part-time jobs.

"Minimum wage is OK, but now add two to three kids. You have to pay rent, utilities and transportation costs. It creates a hole that's real difficult to crawl out of," Shudick said.

Longfellow said her parents are paying her college costs for the first four years, but she has a car payment, hospital bills and other bills. Plus, she wants to go on to graduate school, which she knows she'll need to obtain loans to accomplish. She also wants to move out of the dorms and into an apartment, which she can't do on her current salary.

"I definitely would like to see minimum wage increased. You can't live on $7.25 an hour," she said.

ST LOUIS BUSINESS JOURNAL - Jacob Kirin

A change to St. Louis Alderman Shane Cohn's minimum wage bill has some nonprofits fearing they'll be forced to close.

In previous versions of Board Bill 83, which would increase the city's minimum wage to $11 by 2018, people with developmental disabilities who are employed by licensed workshops were exempted, meaning they could continue receiving subminimum wages.

Drafters removed that exemption Tuesday.

“We are trying to support folks who have issues such as that,” Cohn said during the Board of Aldermen’s special meeting, when it perfected the bill, which could get final passage Friday. “Workers in those industries do deserve to take care of themselves. Oftentimes they don’t have family around them... Our social services in the state of Missouri are completely inadequate.”

But Mike Stroud, executive director of Industrial Aid, said the move could result in hundreds of job losses.

That organization, with revenue and expenses each at about $4.2 million for the fiscal year ended June 30, 2014, according to its most recent IRS filing, employs 140 people with disabilities, all of whom make below the minimum wage because they’re paid based on productivity levels, Stroud said.

A federal law allows employers to pay workers with disabilities at subminimum wages.

The question now, Stroud said, is whether a local ordinance may contradict the U.S. Fair Labor Standards Act.

Fulvio Franzi, executive director of sheltered employment programs for the Missouri Department of Elementary and Secondary Education, said St. Louis’ proposed ordinance “could be problematic.” He said 372 people with disabilities are employed by four shelters in the city of St. Louis, including Worth Industries and MERS/Missouri Goodwill Industries.

Generally, he said, those people “cannot compete in competitive business and industry.”

Matt Burrige, CEO of Project Inc., is also worried. Without the exemption, he said, “we wouldn’t be able to exist.” Project Inc., with revenue and expenses each at nearly $1.4 million for the fiscal year ended June 30, 2014, employs 92 people with disabilities, Burrige said. He said the vast majority of those workers could not, for example, work as baggers in a grocery. Instead, he said, they do subassembly and packaging work.

“The irony,” Burrige said, “is that by trying to do a good thing the most disabled workers could be punished.”

“We’re a nonprofit, and work on a very tight budget,” he said. “We provide jobs through competitive bidding for contracts, and to double our labor costs in a labor-intensive market would have a high probability of shutting us.”

The St. Louis-based Starkloff Disability Institute, which advocates for the disabled, said in a statement, “Sheltered workshops pay their workers below minimum wage, which does not support their independence. However, we recognize that sheltered workshops are charitable institutions. Legislation must be carefully planned to avoid abrupt changes and ensure the long-term viability of these organizations.”

If passed and signed by St. Louis Mayor Francis Slay, the bill would go into effect Oct. 15. St. Louis County in July failed to advance a bill that would have raised the minimum wage in unincorporated areas there to $15 by 2020.

The city bill's proponents are sticking by the change.

"Paraquad would never support subminimum wages for people with disabilities. Period," said Aimee Wehmeier, executive director and CEO of Paraquad, a nonprofit that advances independent living for the disabled.

LOS ANGELES TIMES - Katie Linthicum

At a recent anti-immigrant rally in the Inland Empire, where activists stood on a street corner chanting, "Help America, not illegals," several sported the same white T-shirt. On it, in large blue letters, was a name: "Trump."

This has been a satisfying summer for those who favor stricter immigration enforcement, thanks in no small part to Republican presidential front-runner Donald Trump.

Less than a year ago, activists watched angrily as President Obama took sweeping executive action to shield millions of people in the country without legal status from deportation. But in a few short months, Trump has helped flip the national dialogue and given rise to a new surge of calls to ramp up deportations and wall off the Mexican border.

In Trump, anti-immigrant activists have found a brash and unapologetic celebrity spokesman — one whose impenitence was on display Tuesday when he tangled over immigration with Univision anchor Jorge Ramos after briefly kicking him out of a news conference.

Trump's outrage over crimes committed by immigrants in the country illegally has spurred congressional assaults on "sanctuary city" policies. His proposal to end citizenship for children born to immigrants without legal status has forced more-moderate Republican presidential candidates to the right, with former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush and others using the controversial phrase "anchor babies."

"It's a good time for us," said longtime anti-immigrant activist Robin Hvidston, whose group, We the People Rising, helped organize the rally in Ontario over the weekend. "Donald Trump has brought these issues to the front burner. Does it feel like public opinion is shifting? I'd say yes."

A certain whiplash has come to define the immigration debate in recent years in the absence of a comprehensive fix to a system that all sides say is broken. Fierce battles play out episodically in Washington and at the state and local level, with activists on both sides trading defeats and victories.

Now the divisive issue is once again at the forefront of the presidential campaign — a fate Republican Party leaders hoped to avoid after 2012, when they ascribed their White House loss in part to their failure to win over large numbers of Latinos.

Recently, it seemed the immigration debate had swung in favor of immigrant advocates. Polls show a large majority of Americans support a path to citizenship, and advocates have won important victories at the local level, with driver's licenses, healthcare and financial aid at public universities now available to immigrants without legal status in some states.

In November, after congressional Republicans repeatedly blocked efforts to pass an immigration overhaul bill that would provide a path to citizenship for the 11 million people living in the country illegally, Obama acted on his own. Advocates celebrated when he announced that he would protect up to 5 million immigrants with long-standing ties to the U.S. from deportation.

But a judge's ruling in February to put Obama's program on hold suddenly halted the momentum. And Trump's rise appears to have only accelerated what some see as a rising tide of anti-immigrant sentiment.

For immigrant advocacy groups, many of which had hired extra staff and even expanded office space in anticipation of an influx of applicants for Obama's program, this summer has been a period of soul-searching and playing defense.

After Obama announced his immigration actions last fall, "everybody was really excited, and we declared victory," said Cristina Jimenez, managing director of United We Dream. "I remember my dad crying and feeling like he finally had hope. Now people are frustrated and people are disappointed and people are angry."

Since his campaign kickoff speech in June, in which he brazenly called Mexican immigrants "rapists" and criminals, Trump has espoused rhetoric that appears designed to rile immigrant advocates and fire up their adversaries. Pablo Alvarado, director of the National Day Laborer Organizing Network, said Trump's campaign is "normalizing" anti-immigrant ideas and racist rhetoric long considered fringe views.

His campaign has been embraced by those on the extreme right on immigration. The Daily Stormer, a website that has called for anti-immigrant violence, endorsed Trump for president. The Federation for American Immigration Reform, which seeks to reduce all forms of immigration, praised Trump's recent policy paper on immigration as the "American workers' Bill of Rights."

But Trump's calls to end birthright citizenship, erect an impenetrable border fence and triple the number of immigration agents are also finding a broader audience. Polls show him with strong support across Republican demographics.

Several leading groups that advocate for stricter immigration enforcement, including Numbers U.S.A. and Californians for Population Stabilization, report that their organizations have seen an uptick in Facebook and Web traffic in recent months.

"People are waking up," said Toni Holle, 60, a tea party activist from Chino Hills. "I think some people were afraid to say that they were against illegal immigration because, you know, you don't want to be called a racist. With Donald Trump at the forefront, people feel more at ease stepping out with their views. I think people are willing to stand up and say, 'No more.'"

Mark Potok, the director of the Southern Poverty Law Center, which tracks extremist groups, said Trump "has tapped into an underlying, very angry current."

But he pointed out that there are fewer organized nativist extremist groups than a decade ago, when the vigilante Minuteman Project stationed armed activists at the Mexican border.

Many immigrant supporters say Trump represents a minority view that is getting extra airtime now because it is Republican primary season.

“You’ve got a constituency that is struggling with change,” said Los Angeles City Councilman Gil Cedillo, who sponsored several bills that helped immigrants in the country illegally while he was a state assemblyman. “It’s not the America they thought they were going to grow up in. Trump’s response has been to scapegoat immigrants. He says, ‘Blame them.’”

That doesn’t mean it should be ignored, Cedillo said.

“It’s dangerous rhetoric,” he said, citing a recent case in Boston in which a man praised Trump’s immigration views after allegedly assaulting a homeless Latino man.

In Trump, many see echoes of former California Gov. Pete Wilson, who branded himself as tough on immigration during his 1994 reelection campaign. The Republican also supported Proposition 187, a measure that denied immigrants in the country illegally access to public services.

Wilson was reelected and Proposition 187 passed. But California Republicans paid a price, as Latinos launched campaigns to register huge number of voters and eventually turned the state blue.

That chapter is a lesson for how immigrant advocates should respond now, said Angelica Salas, executive director of the Coalition for Humane Immigrant Rights of Los Angeles. “We’ve got to build more political power across the state and across the country,” she said.

Trump’s campaign is an attack on all Latinos, she said. “He’s ignoring everything that we are to this country, all of our contributions. It’s a slap in the face over and over again.”

Marco Rubio: Eliminating the capital gains tax will help bartenders like my father

WASHINGTON POST - Greg Sargent

It’s widely assumed that most of the GOP presidential candidates will eventually roll out tax plans that cut taxes across the board, including at the very top. Yet the GOP candidates have also signaled that they see a greater need than in previous cycles to have an agenda to address inequality.

How Republicans reconcile these two things will be a key dynamic to watch. And one candidate to pay close attention to in this regard is Marco Rubio, who early on in the cycle gave speeches about inequality and challenges facing the middle class, yet has also proposed a tax plan that would eliminate taxes on capital gains, dividends, and estates.

Rubio has argued that he’d be just the person to take on Hillary Clinton over who will help struggling wage earners because he was once one himself. “If I’m our nominee,” Rubio said at the GOP debate, “how is Hillary Clinton going to lecture me about living paycheck to paycheck?”

Now Rubio has demonstrated how he’ll use his biography to defend his tax plan. In an interview with John Harwood, he was asked how people who live paycheck to paycheck will receive his tax plan:

HARWOOD: You said at the debate the other day that you can compete toe to toe with Hillary Clinton on people who live paycheck to paycheck because you lived paycheck to paycheck.

RUBIO: And I was raised paycheck to paycheck.

HARWOOD: How do you think people who live paycheck to paycheck will receive that your tax plan eliminates taxes on estates, capital gains, and dividends?

RUBIO: First of all, capital gains and dividends is investment. My father had a job as a bartender at a hotel. And the reason why he had a job as a bartender is because someone with money invested in that hotel. That’s why he had a salary, and that’s why he had tips.

HARWOOD: One of the critiques of your plan...has been, come on, that’s a step too far. You can’t eliminate capital gains and dividends. It’s a political loser.

RUBIO: Anything you tax, you’re gonna get less of. That’s why we tax cigarettes, because we don’t want people to smoke. We want more investment. Why would we tax it?

It is true that Rubio’s tax plan does offer middle class tax relief through child credits. Rubio will highlight this fact, along with his biography, to make the case that he’s the candidate who is truly focused on helping Americans struggling with stagnating wages. It is also true that Rubio’s tax plan cuts the top tax rate “only” down to 35 percent, which is less of a tax cut than some supply side Republicans would like.

But tax experts who examined Rubio’s plan told Jonathan Chait that once you factor in its elimination of taxes on capital gains, dividends, and estates, what’s left is a tax cut that is hugely regressive, with a good bulk of its benefits going to the wealthy.

Clinton, by contrast, is likely to propose some combination of tax hikes on investments and inherited wealth. Beyond that, Clinton will propose building on Obamacare’s coverage expansion, while Rubio’s health care plan would repeal the ACA and replace it with a plan that would probably mean workers, the poor, and seniors pay more.

In 2012, Democrats succeeded in savaging Mitt Romney’s tax plan over its regressive features. Republicans explaining Romney’s loss have tended to argue that he was an easy target for such attacks because of his personal wealth and his own low effective tax rate, which was due to the fact that his income was largely derived from capital gains and dividends. Rubio’s candidacy seems premised on the idea that his biography will allow him to elude such attacks. Rubio can sell struggling wage earners on the idea that a regressive tax plan eliminating taxes on capital gains and dividends is in their interests, because his father was a struggling wage earner who would not have had a job at all if it weren't for investment.

Donald Trump Says He Wants to Raise Taxes on Himself

BLOOMBERG - David Knowles

Republican front-runner Donald Trump began to flesh out his economic vision for America, and it includes raising taxes on the wealthy.

Trump said during a Wednesday interview on Bloomberg's With All Due Respect that he would like to change the tax code.

"I would change it. I would simplify it," Trump told hosts Mark Halperin and John Heilemann from the lobby of Trump Tower on New York's 5th Ave. Specifically, Trump targeted hedge fund profits, which are currently taxed at a lower rate than regular income.

"I would take carried interest out, and I would let people making hundreds of millions of dollars-a-year pay some tax, because right now they are paying very little tax and I think it's outrageous," Trump said. "I want to lower taxes for the middle class."

Asked whether his proposed changes meant he was prepared to raise taxes on himself, the billionaire framed his answer in terms of fairness.

"That's right. That's right. I'm OK with it. You've seen my statements, I do very well, I don't mind paying some taxes. The middle class is getting clobbered in this country. You know the middle class built this country, not the hedge fund guys, but I know people in hedge funds that pay almost nothing and it's ridiculous, OK?"

Debt ceiling

While Trump's position on taxing hedge fund managers at a higher rate is similar to the views expressed by Democrats Hillary Clinton and Bernie Sanders, his stance on whether Congressional Republicans should battle President Obama over raising the nation's debt ceiling is anything but.

"I would say that it's worth the fight, because honestly there's so much fat in Washington, that if you had the right people in there you could cut it and there would be no problem," Trump said.

Still, Trump acknowledged that while he believed that Republicans should attempt to stand their ground, the reality is that the ceiling would once again be lifted.

"Short term, maybe it's going to happen," Trump said.

Corporate inversion

Trump also signaled he was willing to take on the issue of corporate inversion, by which companies are re-incorporated abroad as a way to skirt costs of doing business when based in the U.S., and said he had discussed the subject with American businessman Carl Icahn.

"I just spoke to him, and he said, 'such a big problem, corporate inversion.' Where we have two-and-a-half trillion dollars sitting outside, can't come in and now what's happening is companies are leaving this country," Trump said. "You know it used to be you'd leave New York for Florida, or you leave New Jersey for Texas or something. It used to be state to state. Now it's country for country. We have companies with thousands and thousands of jobs that are leaving this country to go out and get their money."

His solution to the problem involves lowering corporate taxes.

"Let the money come in, tax it at a much lower rate, and let the money come in," Trump said, adding. "This is money that could be spent in this country, and they can't get it in."

Currency devaluation

One of Trump's biggest targets of late has been the Chinese government, which has devalued its currency in the face of a stock market crash. During the interview, however, Heilemann noted that each devaluation results in lower prices on Chinese goods. "Are you against the notion of lower prices for American consumers?," Heilemann asked.

"No, what I'm against is when they devalue their currency and this has been a big thing with me for a long time. Not only that, Japan is doing the big devaluation now, so it's impossible for our companies to compete."

Odds of winning

With every new poll, Trump's support numbers seem to go up. Perhaps it's no surprise then that his own assessment of his odds of actually winning the presidency have also risen. Asked two months ago what he thought his chances were of becoming the 45th president, Trump told Halperin and Heilemann "anywhere from 10 to 20 percent." During Thursday's interview, however, he sounded a bit more confident.

"Let's say maybe 25 or 30 percent. If you're conservative. I'm conservative," Trump said.

Just left you a message. This is his question. Should I plant a question today about Biden or should we just wait till someone asks? Let me know.

If he gets question about Biden:

- Great deal of respect for VP
- We have a fine group of candidates
- Not hearing people calling for new candidates
- Candidates we have speaking to issues

I have text of riverside speech as delivered—does anyone have final as prepared? Thanks.

THIS IS WHAT REAL CHANGE LOOKS LIKE

Greeting and Acknowledgements

- Thank you all for being here today.
- Acknowledge: Pastor James Forbes, Len Leach – Riverside Board Chair, Schools Chancellor Carmen Farina, and Hon. David Dinkins
- I also want to take a moment to acknowledge the tireless work of the women and men in Albany who stand poised to produce a budget agreement that would deliver positive change for our City's kids on an unprecedented scale.
- And I want to offer our continued prayers for the families who lost loved ones in the East Harlem tragedy two weeks ago. You remain in our hearts.
- I am so honored to stand before you here at Riverside Church... So humbled to be speaking before a Congregation that has hosted some of history's powerful voices for justice, equality, and change.... From Martin Luther King Jr., to Nelson Mandela.
- This venue – with its stunning physical grandeur and storied legacy of progressive activism, leadership, and inclusiveness – represents an inspiring microcosm of the City we all love.

1. We care about every child.

- New York City only lives up to its promise – and we only live up to our responsibility -- when every child has a chance at chasing their dreams.
- Our kids deserve better than the false choice that they've been given for far too long – that their city could either help a select few of them...or none at all.

2. Status quo thinking is unacceptable.

- For far too many – especially people of color – our system is failing... FAILING to open the doors of opportunity to our changing economy.
- We set out to fix our schools in meaningful way – a way that acknowledges that the status quo is BROKEN and that no steps our city has taken in the past are adequate to fix it.

3. Charters can help.

- Charters can play an important role by experimenting and innovating in ways that are more difficult for traditional public schools.
- I reject the false construct that says charter school students and students in traditional public schools are trapped in a zero-sum game... that the success of one must come at the expense of the other.
- But we must never forget why charter schools were created in the first place – to act as laboratories of experimentation in education, with hope for – and the mission of – bringing best practices to traditional public schools...so that EVERY child can benefit.

4. But we need fairness and progress for the entire school system.

- There are some who see charter schools in a very different way – as a vehicle for ESCAPING those traditional public schools that are underperforming.
- Every parent longs for the very best education for their children. But when so many traditional public schools have fallen short of that promise, it's easy to understand why many parents see charter schools this way. They're tired of being promised an excellent public school around the corner – and they're willing to go to great lengths to get their child in a school – any school – that provides them the opportunity to succeed.

- The failure is not theirs. It is a failure of leadership from their elected officials, who for decades have fallen short in making good on that promise. And I refuse to be one of those elected officials.
- I don't see our traditional public schools as something to give up on...something to escape from. I see them as my responsibility to lift up.
- Think of traditional public schools for our kids' education in the way we think of Medicare for our seniors' health care. Medicare works so well because it works for EVERY senior. We want the highest quality health care for every senior citizen – and we embrace experiments in the delivery of health care that will make Medicare even stronger.
- But what we won't abide is the privatization of Medicare – pitting the fortunate few seniors against everyone else, and weakening the entire Medicare system in the process.
- Think for a moment about your own kids. You want the very best for all of them. If you have a chance to send one child to a great school, you would rightly jump at the chance. But you wouldn't do it if it meant your other kids would be shortchanged by THEIR schools...if they were left to live their lives with something less than they have now.
- In short, you wouldn't choose between your children. And as mayor, I won't choose between New York's children.
- My vision focuses on solutions that address the root cause of challenges in our schools – with early childhood education and supervised after-school programs chief among them.
- The keys to students' success in school are putting them on the right path and keeping them there. That's what these programs do. And that will lift up our ENTIRE education system.

5. What we ACTUALLY did on co-locations.

- Many of you have heard of my decision not to approve the colocation of a charter school in Harlem.
- We rejected that proposal because had we permitted it, it would have meant fewer seats in the school for special education students -- kids with serious disabilities.

6. I messed up in not communicating, to parents and students across our city, WHY we were doing what we did.

- But I failed in communicating just WHY we were taking that action. And I accept responsibility for that mistake. It caused a lot of frustration among concerned folks who were just looking for answers.
- It also distracted from what we're trying to do to help EVERY child of our city – securing the funds we need for universal, full-day Pre-K and after-school for every middle school student.

7. Let's move forward together.

- Charter schools, traditional public schools, and religious schools all have an important role to play in challenging the status quo and improving our system.
- The challenge of providing all of our children with a quality education can and should be approached from multiple angles, as long as they converge in a place where no one falls through the cracks.

8. I know Gov. Cuomo is committed to Pre-K for NYC kids, and I thank him for it.

- I know Governor Cuomo is committed to securing Pre-K for our City's kids, and I thank him for that.

- But let me be clear. Winning expanded Pre-K and after-school for our kids will not be a victory for a mayor or a governor – or any politician.

9. This will be YOUR victory.

- This will be YOUR victory.
- Because of your work – community leaders, activists, everyday New Yorkers who have dedicated so much passion to our cause – we are on the verge of securing unprecedented funding for our universal pre-k and afterschool.
- Will it be everything I want? No. Will there be more – much more – to do? Absolutely.
- But though our progress is incomplete, it is powerful and it is real.

10. This is what real change looks like.

- In my campaign for Mayor, we said that we were going to make our city one city...where we treat every child as our own.
- There are those who argue that change must be small and incremental and tinker around the edges... that in politics, “you just can’t help everyone.”
- Well, ask yourself this. Who is “everyone?” I think I know. I’m looking around this congregation, and I see a whole lot of “everyones” out there.
- And, Riverside, we know who “everyone’s kids” are – they are yours and mine. And if we leave ANY child behind, we fail EVERY New Yorker.
- For years, we’ve heard politicians talk about full-day Pre-K. And for years, it was nothing more than words. Today, it is REAL.

- It would mean hundreds of millions of dollars of new, dedicated funding;
- It would mean tens of thousands of kids and families benefiting from it;
- And it would mean sowing the seeds of success by putting young lives on a path to meaningful contributions that will benefit our City for generations.

11. This is part – but jut one part -- of big systemic changes we need.

- This week, we stand on the verge of taking an important step towards the big systematic change our school system needs.
- We can't stop here... we'll take more crucial steps in the months and years to come:
- Steps to give more of our the children the structured time and safe environment that afterschool programs provide;
- Steps to do more to increase parental involvement, and treat parents as the critical stakeholders they are;
- And steps to do more to make sure that we are empowering good teachers to become great career educators in our public schools.
- The great 20th century philosopher and theologian, Paul Tillich, said this: “The noise of these shallow waters prevents us from listening to the sounds out of the depth, to the sounds of what really happens in the ground of our social structure, in the longing hearts of the masses, and in the struggling minds of those who are sensitive to historical changes.”
- We New Yorkers – those of us gathered here today, and those who live in every neighborhood of our city – those with children in traditional public schools, religious schools, and charter schools – WE are the ones with longing hearts and struggling minds – WE are the ones who are striving for something better for the next generation.

- We will block out the noise of negative TV ads and overheated rhetoric and political posturing – truly listening to the sounds from the depth of our hearts...our communities...our neighborhoods.
- And we will achieve a great victory here in New York City. We will be ONE City. And we will do it...together.

Labor Board Says Contractors' Workers Can Bargain With Parent Company

NY TIMES - Noam Scheiber

http://www.nytimes.com/2015/08/28/business/labor-board-says-franchise-workers-can-bargain-with-parent-company.html?_r=0

The National Labor Relations Board in Washington on Thursday made it substantially easier for unions to bargain for higher wages and benefits, potentially opening the door for organized workers at fast-food chains and other franchises to negotiate with corporations like McDonald's and Yum Brands, rather than with individual restaurants, where they might have a harder time achieving their goals.

“This is about, if employees decide they want to bargain collectively, who can be required to come to the bargaining table to have negotiations that are meaningful,” said Wilma B. Liebman, a former N.L.R.B. chairwoman who wrote a crucial dissent in a 2002 case on the subject.

The ruling, which may eventually be challenged in court in a variety of individual disputes, changes the definition of a crucial employer-employee relationship that had held in some form since the 1980s. Now, a company that hires a contractor to staff its facilities may be considered a so-called joint employer of the workers at that facility, even if it does not actively supervise them.

A union representing those workers would now be legally entitled to bargain with the upstream company, not just the contractor, under federal labor law.

“The ruling is especially important because sometimes the contractor is such a small entity, it exists on such a shoestring, that you have to get the lead firm to the table,” Ms. Liebman said.

In the case, the N.L.R.B. held that a company called Browning-Ferris Industries of California was a joint employer of workers hired by a contractor to help staff the company's recycling center. But the ruling could apply well beyond companies that rely on contractors and staffing agencies, extending to companies with large numbers of franchisees.

“The decision today could be one of the more significant by the N.L.R.B. in the last 35 years,” said Marshall Babson, a lawyer who helped write the brief for the U.S. Chamber of Commerce in the case and who was a Democratic appointee to the labor board in Ronald Reagan's presidency. “ Depending on how the board applies its new ‘indirect test,’ it will likely ensnare an ever-widening circle of employers and bargaining relationships.”

Beyond Browning-Ferris, the ruling may have a significant immediate effect on a case the labor board is litigating against McDonald's and several of its franchisees. In that case, the N.L.R.B.'s general counsel, who essentially acts as a prosecutor, asserts that the company is a joint employer along with a number of franchisees, making it potentially liable for numerous reported violations of workers' rights, like retaliating against those who have tried to organize unions.

Thursday's N.L.R.B. ruling, by enshrining a broader joint-employer definition into doctrine, makes it more likely to apply in the McDonald's case as well, though experts point out that joint employer designations are typically very dependent on the circumstances of each case.

Business representatives said the ruling could make it much harder to operate franchises in the future, undermining a popular path for many entrepreneurs.

"This will clearly jeopardize small employers and the future viability of the franchise model," said Steve Caldeira, president of the International Franchise Association, an industry group. "If I'm an existing and/or aspiring franchisee, why would I want to expand my business and/or get into franchising if I don't have the ability to run the day-to-day operations of the business?"

Before Thursday's ruling, the prevailing doctrine typically required the upstream company to exert "direct and immediate" control over working conditions of employees at its franchisees or contractors to be considered a joint employer.

But the N.L.R.B. ruling moves the standard closer, if not all the way back, to what some say is its more liberal, pre-1980s interpretation. Under the new test, a company can be considered a joint employer even if it has only indirect control over working conditions — say, through requiring the use of certain scheduling software that affects the timing and length of workers' shifts.

This is a pretty cool line up (see below)

11. Rio+20 reaffirmed the commitment to strengthen international cooperation to address the persistent challenges related to sustainable development for all, in particular in developing countries. In this regard, it reaffirmed the need to achieve economic stability, sustained economic growth, the promotion of social equity and the protection of the environment, while enhancing gender equality, women's empowerment and equal employment for all, and the protection, survival and development of children to their full potential, including through education.

The MC of the opening ceremony is Richard Curtis and we should also know if Hugh Jackman is confirmed by next week.

Hello –

Thank you for your time on the call just a moment ago. We will have 17 different public figures announcing the 17 Sustainable Development Goals to the world. Some will be in person, some will come in via video. We'd love it if the Mayor would announce Goal 11 during our opening Social Good Summit ceremony on September 27 at or around noon. The opening ceremony is in partnership with Project Everyone and filmmaker, Richard Curtis. I've included the list of goal readers below.

The MC of the opening ceremony is Richard Curtis and we should also know if Hugh Jackman is confirmed by next week.

To Whom It May Concern:

I just sent an email to Raymond following up on a request sent back on March 12th for the Mayor to speak at this year's Social Good Summit. We would be honored to have the Mayor speak about global cities at the sixth annual Social Good Summit, which will take place at the 92nd Street Y on September 27 & 28. I've included some information below. I have attached a formal invitation letter to this email. Of course, we are more than open to his and your ideas for the conversation, as well as any guests that he would like to join him on stage.

Hosted in partnership with Mashable, the United Nations Foundation, and the United Nations Development Programme, the Social Good Summit is a global and marquee UN Week event that brings communities and leaders around the world together to explore how technology and innovation can be used to promote social good. Here are a few additional notes on the Summit:

- Engages 2,000+ audience members onsite at 92Y
- + community meet-ups in more than 100 countries around the world
- Past speakers include Al Gore, Malala Yousafzai, Michael Dell, Samantha Power, will.i.am, Melinda Gates, Richard Branson, Ted Turner, Alicia Keys, Pete Cashmore, Susan Rice, Archbishop Desmond Tutu, Elie Wiesel, Pharell and many more. Here's a complete list of last year's speakers.

Thank you for your attention to this and I look forward to discussing this further. Please let me know if you have any questions.

Best,

Joey

Hi Raymond –

I hope this finds you well and enjoying your summer. I'm just checking to see if you and your team have been able to review our request for the Mayor to speak at this year's Social Good Summit. We are gearing up for another major speaker announcement and would love to include the Mayor. Of course, we understand if you still need time. I look forward to connecting.

Connected with Hayley on this. Sounds like we can structure the event however we want. My recommendation is below. Biggest questions are who should participate, do we take audience questions and what role do we want the Mayor to play, either intro the film; moderate the panel discussion; or participate in the discussion as a panelist.

Let me know what folks think. And do we need to go back to the Mayor for his final approval on the format and his role?

Subject: Sept 10 Mayor's Event

Hi All--

Wanted to touch base with you regarding a Mayoral event coming up in a few weeks to make sure it is on everyone's radar.

On September 10 at 4:30PM the Mayor is hosting a screening of a Robert Greenwald movie about how the top 25 hedgefunders in the country make more than all of the kindergarten teachers combined, and teachers are also being taxed at a higher rate than hedgefund billionaires.

The movie is short (5-10 minutes) and the format though not set yet, will likely be opening remarks by BDB who intros the movie, screen the movie, then conversation with BDB (tbd) Robert Greenwald, others-- maybe a teacher, Carmen, etc.

We also need to get audience there for the screening. Not sure who else we need to loop in to make all of this happen, but wanted to get the conversation started.

JDC and I have been working with Greenwald so far, and have booked the space with PACE, but since it is a Mayoral event, i assume we need to loop in other agency folks, staff who can help crowdbuild, etc.

Would love to hear your thoughts on who else should be involved, next steps, etc.

Thanks,
Hayley

Crusties is a term of art — here's the NYT piece about them from a few years ago...

In East Village, Harbingers of Spring Are Missing

For years, warm weather in the East Village has been heralded by an influx of young, tattooed visitors carrying backpacks and bedrolls and wearing clothes so stiffened with grit that they have come to be known in the neighborhood as crusties.

Their arrival in Tompkins Square Park has become a predictable harbinger of spring, a surviving custom in a neighborhood that has undergone various upheavals and changes over the past several decades.

But this year, they have not materialized. People have reported stray sightings of one or two visitors, but nothing like what the neighborhood has come to expect. No one knows if they are simply late this year or if, for some reason, they will not come at all. Either way, their absence has been conspicuous.

"It's like the birds aren't migrating this year; the salmon aren't swimming upstream," said Chris Flash, an East Village resident who runs a local bike courier service and an underground newspaper called The Shadow.

"The whole ecology of the neighborhood is out of whack."

Photo

On Tuesday, the benches were empty along a stretch known locally as Crusty Row. Credit Marcus Yam for The New York Times The visitors are seasonal nomads, crossing the nation in rough accordance with changing weather patterns, heading south or west in the winter and venturing toward the Northeast in the summer months. Many travel along rail lines like the Union Pacific and the Norfolk Southern, hoisting themselves into empty freight train boxcars.

Several cities are known to be relatively hospitable to the travelers, among them San Francisco, New Orleans, Philadelphia and Richmond, Va. In New York, the group has become such a fixture in Tompkins Square Park that the area where members have generally assembled — near the park's western edge, just south of the Temperance Fountain — is known as Crusty Row. There, the travelers could typically be found relaxing on wooden benches and whiling away the hours talking (adventurous tales of illicit rail travel were popular), drinking (preferred beverages included cheap vodka, malt liquor or "space bags," the name given to the silvery bladders found in boxes of wine) and smoking (self-rolled cigarettes predominated). Dozens of the nomads would set up what seemed like semipermanent encampments along the row, at one point designating their territory with a black flag emblazoned with a skull and crossbones. Many would arrive at the park shortly after the 6 a.m. opening time and remain until the midnight curfew, leaving in between only to avail themselves of free meals handed out on Avenue A or to ask for spare change on St. Marks Place. Last summer, a steady flow of the travelers frequented the park from May through September. During that time, a local photographer, Steven Hirsch, documented the visitors' presence and recorded their stories on a blog, crustypunks.blogspot.com <<http://crustypunks.blogspot.com/>>. This year, Mr. Hirsch theorized that the visitors were steering clear of their usual haunt to avoid a blizzard of summonses that he said the police began issuing late last summer for infractions like drinking in public or lying on a bench.

A street poet who goes by the name L.E.S. (for Lower East Side) Jewels, a Crusty Row regular who lives in New York year round, agreed with Mr. Hirsch. On a recent afternoon, he sat on a bench in Tompkins Square Park, away from the Row, and ruminated in rhyme on the absence of his more mobile comrades:

"It's a park, it's for all, for all to be,
and Tompkins Square now is just a memory, it ain't like it used to be.

I'm sitting here in Tompkins Square, drinking vodka like I do anywhere, next thing you know you got a pair of cuffs on,
and those silver bracelets, they ain't no fun."

Over the years, some people who frequent the park have expressed distaste for the travelers, saying that too many drink alcohol openly and that they tend to create a disorderly atmosphere. Others have been more tolerant, arguing that whatever harm the travelers cause is only to themselves.

Susan Stetzer, the district manager of Community Board 3, suggested that many East Village residents had accepted the visitors.

"People just don't make a big deal about them," Ms. Stetzer wrote in an e-mail, adding, "At least they are quiet."

On a recent afternoon, Crusty Row was empty, save for a few parkgoers. Levent Gulsoy, 55, gazed toward the empty row of benches where the travelers used to gather. "That's not a good sign," he said. "When one species disappears, others tend to follow."

I'd like to propose

September 16th or 17th--- Community Schools family night (reminder- all renewal schools becoming community schools)

all 130 Community Schools (including 94 Renewals) will be announcing to parents that they are becoming a community school through banners, signage, welcoming tables asking parents to get involved, booths advertising for services like Warby Parker eyeglasses and health-care.

Family Night is a pre-established Open school night for all schools but we'll be making it special for Community Schools.

They can add an interactive component for Mayor with parents.

Great amplification for the speech on the 16th

Strategic reasons for recommending this route:

- 1) allows us to showcase your fun side in an outlet that tends to drive coverage both on broadcast and beyond NYC
- 2) will help us nestle the news of 3 games (which you note will cause the world to collapse for some) and position you as a very relatable "sports fanatic" . This is not about reaction to anticipated tabloid fodder, but more about making sure we always have the upper hand
- 3) reporter is low key and will abide by ground rules

Sir,

We decided against doing sports radio because Mike Francesa's show is live from a bar with somewhat out of control crowd.

Alternatively, we could invite Jon Lemire and let him sit with you for about 3 innings. It would be a conversation focused on baseball and would get result in wide circulation.

Are you interested in this route?

B off. Love this too, one tweak - can we also frame as this is how BdB does his politics. Some pols do dinners and drinks and whatever - but he's working the Queens delegation and the BP over Mets games. It's work - him doing politics well.

Strategic reasons for recommending this route:

- 1) allows us to showcase your fun side in an outlet that tends to drive coverage both on broadcast and beyond NYC
- 2) will help us nestle the news of 3 games (which you note will cause the world to collapse for some) and position you as a very relatable "sports fanatic" . This is not about reaction to anticipated tabloid fodder, but more about making sure we always have the upper hand
- 3) reporter is low key and will abide by ground rules

Sir,

We decided against doing sports radio because Mike Francesa's show is live from a bar with somewhat out of control crowd.

Alternatively, we could invite Jon Lemire and let him sit with you for about 3 innings. It would be a conversation focused on baseball and would get result in wide circulation.

Are you interested in this route?

Peter

Sir,

In thinking about the discussion last night about authenticity and relatability, we've kicked around having you do some sports radio if you are "game" for it (nice pun, right!) as we head into the 3 game series. Pulling together recommendations and will send shortly for your review. Of course, if it's a no-go with schedule we understand.

Thanks,
Andrea

Lemire can go tonight and he is already going to the Sunday game. Will be with family, but he could probably sneak away for a bit.

If it is for one inning tonight, don't think it is worth bringing him out.

Sir,

The booth didn't work and we were considering Francesa as an alternate option in advance of the game.

We discussed and recommend bringing Lemire along Sunday. This gives him the opportunity to talk baseball and experience a game with you, while seeing you interact with other electeds over baseball.

Subject: BNF Hedge Fund v Teachers Video Summary
Date: Friday, August 28, 2015 6:00:11 PM

Hi all -

Here is the summary of the video – let me know if you have any questions. I sent you the specifics we have on the teachers yesterday.

Kindergarten Teachers v Hedge Fund Managers (working title) is an approximately 5-minute video that takes the viewer through two main facts:

1. The top 25 US hedge fund managers make more than all US kindergarten teachers combined.
2. Hedge fund managers are taxed at lower rates than kindergarten teachers as a result of the carried interest loophole.

The film interviews the following teachers:

Giselle Hagenmayer

Erika Jones

Stuart Scolnik

Veronica Gonzalez

Zeena Pliska

And the following expert:

Stephen Lerner, Georgetown University Fellow

The teachers describe their jobs, how little they make, and their horror upon learning that millionaires get taxed at lower rates than they do.

The expert describes, in layman's terms, why this happens – namely, the carried interest tax loophole.

The end of the film will make a call to action to close the carried interest loophole. Specifics of the ask are still being determined.

Hey,

Am back in the office.....Please know that I've circulated this request several times to the appropriate internals but unfortunately it's a very slow time with most of our members away for the summer break. Our school year does not commence until Wednesday, September 9th so most of our folks are still away. FYI, We've got a staff retreat on August 31st and perhaps we'll have better luck for names of interested kindergarten teachers then. I've placed a call/email to Lynn Yabroudi, a kindergarten special ed teacher, who initially was very interested but I haven't heard anything back. It does seem strange that none of the teachers contacted were interested in participating but we've had a lot going on in NYC re evaluations & testing. Perhaps folks just got caught up in that.

My understanding is that no one internally is aware of any event with the Mayor in September re this project but please keep in mind that the first few days of school are particularly hectic and our members will be in their respective schools. It would be helpful if we had the logistics of the event as soon as possible. Goes without saying that I'll keep working this until our retreat...

Best, Maureen

Hi John & Maureen -

I am following up on this one last time.

It would be VERY helpful to have NY kindergarten teacher in the film and for the event in NY.

Now that school is back in in many places, are there a few you can connect us to this week?

We need them asap to film them, edit the piece, and have it ready for the event.

Let us know – thanks,

Hi Maureen -

Thanks for the quick response. We reached out to all of the teachers you gave us info for, but only two responded and neither were ultimately willing to participate.

Thus, we would LOVE a few more contacts. If there are any we (or the mayor's office) can reach out to now, that would be great.

The Mayor's event is going to involve the mayor, Brave New Films, ideally you all, and community groups doing a press conference and screening of the film. Details are still being worked out, but it will be sometime that late afternoon/evening. As of now, it will be at PACE University.

Thanks so much for your help with this.

Hi Regina,

I gave your team the names we had a while ago...the week after the initial 'ask' from John. I believe there were two that wanted to participate in the documentary. Did none of them work out? I believe Lynne Yabroudi was very keen.

Most of our members are away on summer break but I'll loop in Karen Alford & Ellie to see if they have any ideas re reach out for kindergarten teachers. We may have better luck later on in August when our members return from the summer vacation & perhaps we can connect with a kindergarten teacher then & still meet your need. Can you forward details re the Mayor's event on Sept 10th? I don't have that.

I'll be away for the first weeks of August but hopefully we can find someone for September. Thnx, Best, Maureen

Hey Robert. So sorry for the delay on my end - but I was able to track down the perfect person for you - Maureen Salter at the United Federation of Teachers here in NYC.

I know your shooter is done for this week - but Maureen is eager to help track down some Kindergarten teachers who would fit the bill & could help coordinate for your shooter's next availability.

<http://www.nytimes.com/2015/08/30/nyregion/rudolph-giulianis-outrage-on-homelessness-and-richard-geres.html?ref=nyregion&r=1>

If the offenses of Donald J. Trump weren't getting played out by the hour at the volume of a jackhammer in competition with a Nascar event, then recent comments by another New Yorker synonymous with unchecked expressiveness, and also touched by the pixie dust of presidential aspiration, might be generating more outrage. In an interview with NBC's local news channel in New York, former Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani explained, with both glee and self-regard, that not long ago he had paid a visit to the 19th Precinct station house on the Upper East Side to complain about a homeless man who had taken up residence on his block.

"Do you know when people lived on the streets and didn't use bathrooms inside?" he said. "It's called the Dark Ages."

Needless to say, Mr. Giuliani did not pause and follow up that remark with, "And how disgraceful that so many centuries later we are still not able to house all of our neediest." He instead went on to remind us how in the 1990s, his "brain" and Police Commissioner William J. Bratton's "people" got rid of the homeless, the panhandlers, the nuisances. "You chase 'em and you chase 'em and you chase 'em and you chase 'em, and they either get the treatment that they need or you chase 'em out of the city." (Clearly we should be enticing the naked ladies of Times Square to head to Atlantic City, maybe with brunch coupons for Trump Taj Mahal.

Advocates for the homeless responded with fury, pointing out that Mr. Giuliani's views were "morally appalling" and ignored the way that his own policies had fueled the crisis of homelessness. Of course, his conception of those with no place to live as essentially a gross inconvenience for the rest of us is hardly singular. In recent weeks, an unsettling narrative has unfolded in New York, promoted in large part but by no means exclusively in the tabloid press, demonizing the homeless as a growing presence and a threat to bourgeois life. "Going to the Park? Don't Trip on a Bum," read a headline in The New York Post.

Over the summer, pictures of people sleeping on the streets have been posted on social media with insinuations that their presence is proof that the city is returning to the mayhem of the 1970s. This would suggest that we knew something definitive about the propensity of homeless people to commit serious crimes. We don't. Years ago, a researcher at Johns Hopkins University looked at arrest records in Baltimore for 1983 and found that although homeless people were more likely to commit nonviolent offenses like camping without a permit and indecent exposure, they were less likely to commit crimes against people or property. Homeless people themselves are considerably imperiled; last year, a report from the National Coalition for the Homeless revealed that from 1999 to 2013 there had been 1,437 documented acts of violence in 47 states perpetrated against homeless people by those who were not homeless.

Last year, the number of homeless men, women and children in New York City reached record levels, in large part because of failed or discontinued policies implemented during the Bloomberg years; the issue of affordable housing is obviously one of the most serious and vexing facing the de Blasio administration. At the same time, the number of people spending the night in city shelters, the metric by which the homeless population is measured, has, in fact, been in steady month-to-month decline since December.

This has not stopped the Sergeants Benevolent Association in New York City from implementing an initiative aimed at getting members and their friends and families to photograph homeless people lying on the street or urinating in public and posting those pictures online. (What could be more benevolent?) The association's president has said the campaign — called Peek-a-Boo We See You Too! — was a response to “the diminishing” of the city's reputation as a pre-eminently safe place. “It's outing,” as the actor Richard Gere remarked to me recently.

We were talking about the new film he has produced and in which he stars, “Time Out of Mind,” due next week. It is one of three movies that will be released in fairly quick succession that deal with homelessness in

New York, including a documentary about a former male model who now works as a photographer and who lives on a fire escape, “Homme Less,” and a feature film, “Shelter,” written and directed by Paul Bettany. Mr. Gere’s film had been in development since the late 1980s. “Unfortunately, it was still relevant,” he said.

Mr. Gere has worked with the Coalition for the Homeless for years; he has spent time in shelters; and as a longtime New Yorker, he has committed himself to thinking about his encounters with homeless people. “I went through a period where I insisted on talking, and then I realized how abusive that was — asking people about their stories and these intimate details of their lives,” he said. Now he gives every homeless person he sees some money — from $1 to $5 — and moves on.

Spare and free of melodrama, “Time Out of Mind” examines the immiserating realities of dealing with the bureaucracy around the shelter system and other social services. The film takes great care to render the assault of noise, the difficulties that homeless people have getting any sleep anywhere, and the kind of madness that it produces. It should remind anyone who might have forgotten that homelessness isn’t awful because it degrades the streetscape; it is awful because it degrades lives.

Sir,

The booth didn't work and we were considering Francesa as an alternate option in advance of the game.

We discussed and recommend bringing Lemire along Sunday. This gives him the opportunity to talk baseball and experience a game with you, while seeing you interact with other electeds over baseball.

So today after the game or tmrw before, I should visit with the Mets. I am happy to show my support -- can do with a full heart. Otherwise, I'm not doing my job. Pls fix this NOW

So everyone is in the loop:

We worked out having him go on-field for warm ups. He will arrive at noon, be escorted to home plate, and spend time on the field.

I will handle Lemire and expect to bring him over around the 3rd inning and let them spend 2-3 innings together. This will give the Mayor some time to settle into the game and speak with Queens electeds before bringing Lemire over.

Lemme know if there are any questions.

Subject: Re: Homeless camp walk through and comms proposals

An excellent plan for the week! Well done

Two concerns:

1. As you know, Chirlane will continue to "head up" mental health (I've cc'ed her and her team here). She will effectively be the Chair of and chief spokesperson for all we do on this topic for the duration. Richard will head the Mental Health Cabinet, meaning the actual day-to-day coordination amongst all the agencies, which requires a deputy mayor's involvement. Pls make sure this is crystal clear in the roll-out

2. The broad idea of the encampment event makes sense to me, but don't wrong it could really backfire. I've cc'ed Rosen and Del Cecato for this piece. The danger here is that it will be interpreted wrongly as an attack on the homeless -- which I would never be party to.

Our problem is that as a team we have all (led by me) absolutely sucked at laying down the predicate on this issue. If over the last two months we had set the record straight effectively, this effort re: the encampment would have seemed natural and smooth. In the absence of framing, it could really come across as desperate and over-the-top.

I really want to hear with jonathan and john think -- especially Jonathan because of his long experience on this issue. And I really don't want to alienate our true friends and allies on this issue. So if we can do this right, contextualize it right, explain it right and inhibit media sensationalism, I'm all in.

If not, we should consider having officials other than me and BB do this, and then I speak to it after. Pls discuss without me on the thread and come back with a rec. Thanks

Sir,

Wanted to follow up with you directly on communications proposals for Monday and provide a holistic overview of the week. Know that you'll then discuss with Front Office and make determinations. If you hate this format, I apologize and will re-configure.

Monday

Homeless Encampment Clean Up Operation

Date: Monday, August 30th at 11am

Location: 150th Street & St. Ann's Avenue (south end)– Rae Street & Hegney Place (north end)

Strategy:

- YOU walk with representatives of DHS, DSNY, MOCJ, NYPD, Boom! Health (community service partner) to assess an encampment that is scheduled to be cleaned out this Thursday. There are approximately 12-15 individuals at this site all day long. Debris, including needles and trash, on the ground with tents built up. We are inviting the PC to join.
- We anticipate inviting tier 1 print and TV photographers to cover your visit and plan to pre-position them along the encampment, pending our walk through of the site, to cover you walking the ground flanked by folks and being briefed.
- YOU then are pulled to the side to provide a brief topper to cameras—what you just witnessed and what we are doing about it. We are also inviting the PC.
- 3-5 on-topic questions only. No off topic
- We issue a press release on the encampment work, framing it as YOU assessing the situation and ordering sites be cleaned and enforced. Media will be told that this site will be cleared on Thursday and we expect they will return to watch.

NOTE: You raised earlier the concern about cameras and the spontaneous atmosphere of these walks. We believe that to maximize this opportunity we should have TV-cameras there, but based on your feedback we can limit to just still photogs and no avail. Nothing has been pitched at this time.

Daily News op-ed with homeless focus will run tomorrow

Pre-K Education Twitter Chat

Date: Monday, August 30th, time TBD with scheduling

Location: wherever

Strategy:

- YOU conduct a 10-15 minute twitter chat aimed at parents on the start of school next week.
- Focus is pre-K.
- Could possibly get a question about some of the schools determined not ready to be opened. Answers will be prepped for you. This is our opportunity to have you begin to reach New Yorkers directly rather than through press conferences.

Weekly Communications

Press avail – 2 in community (Bronx homeless encampment walk w/gaggle; affordable housing press conference)

Radio- 2 (Lehrer and Martinez)

Non-traditional -1 (twitter chat)

Off Topic -- 2 (Tuesday Lehrer; Thursday press conference)

Priority Buckets

If we are planning an event to tell the world about some new tools we have in place to help homeless folks, then I think it's fine. If what we are doing is "cracking down" on groups of poor, mentally-ill people with nowhere else to go, then it's not. And if all we are really planning to do is chase troubled people from one place to another, then we're no better than Giuliani. I have not heard about any new programmatic initiatives here -- until we have them, I don't think we're ready to go.

I'll irritate everyone by referencing Tompkins Square Park. Tony - this AM - there were 7 people sleeping in the main grassy area at 7am - so a 5-person reduction from Friday at the same time - but still feels out of control.

I know Ginia Belafonte had a thoughtful column this AM - but I don't think it represents the vast majority of New Yorkers, who believe homelessness is a quality of life issue, and is getting way out of hand.

Richard will head the Mental Health Cabinet, meaning the actual day-to-day coordination amongst all the agencies, which requires a deputy mayor's involvement. Pls make sure this is crystal clear in the roll-out

2. The broad idea of the encampment event makes sense to me, but don't wrong it could really backfire. I've cc'ed Rosen and Del Cecato for this piece. The danger here is that it will be interpreted wrongly as an attack on the homeless -- which I would never be party to.

Our problem is that as a team we have all (led by me) absolutely sucked at laying down the predicate on this issue. If over the last two months we had set the record straight effectively, this effort re: the encampment would have seemed natural and smooth. In the absence of framing, it could really come across as desperate and over-the-top.

I really want to hear with jonathan and john think -- especially Jonathan because of his long experience on this issue. And I really don't want to alienate our true friends and allies on this issue. So if we can do this right, contextualize it right, explain it right and inhibit media sensationalism, I'm all in.

If not, we should consider having officials other than me and BB do this, and then I speak to it after. Pls discuss without me on the thread and come back with a rec. Thanks

Sir,
Wanted to follow up with you directly on communications proposals for Monday and provide a holistic overview of the week. Know that you'll then discuss with Front Office and make determinations. If you hate this format, I apologize and will re-configure.

Monday
Homeless Encampment Clean Up Operation
Date: Monday, August 30th at 11am

Location: 150th Street & St. Ann's Avenue (south end)– Rae Street & Hegney Place (north end)

Strategy:

<!--[if !supportLists]-->• <!--[endif]-->YOU walk with representatives of DHS, DSNY, MOCJ, NYPD, Boom! Health (community service partner) to assess an encampment that is scheduled to be cleaned out this Thursday. There are approximately 12-15 individuals at this site all day long. Debris, including needles and trash, on the ground with tents built up. We are inviting the PC to join.

<!--[if !supportLists]-->• <!--[endif]-->We anticipate inviting tier 1 print and TV photographers to cover your visit and plan to pre-position them along the encampment, pending our walk through of the site, to cover you walking the ground flanked by folks and being briefed.

<!--[if !supportLists]-->• <!--[endif]-->YOU then are pulled to the side to provide a brief topper to cameras—what you just witnessed and what we are doing about it. We are also inviting the PC.

<!--[if !supportLists]-->• <!--[endif]-->3-5 on-topic questions only.
No off topic

<!--[if !supportLists]-->• <!--[endif]-->We issue a press release on the encampment work, framing it as YOU assessing the situation and ordering sites be cleaned and enforced. Media will be told that this site will be cleared on Thursday and we expect they will return to watch.

NOTE: You raised earlier the concern about cameras and the spontaneous atmosphere of these walks. We believe that to maximize this opportunity we should have TV-cameras there, but based on your feedback we can limit to just still photogs and no avail. Nothing has been pitched at this time.

Daily News op-ed with homeless focus will run tomorrow

Pre-K Education Twitter Chat

Date: Monday, August 30th, time TBD with scheduling

Location: wherever

Strategy:

<!--[if !supportLists]-->• <!--[endif]-->YOU conduct a 10-15 minute twitter chat aimed at parents on the start of school next week.

<!--[if !supportLists]-->• <!--[endif]-->Focus is pre-K.

<!--[if !supportLists]-->• <!--[endif]-->Could possibly get a question about some of the schools determined not ready to be opened. Answers will be prepped for you. This is our opportunity to have you begin to reach New Yorkers directly rather than through press conferences.

I'd like to get a list of validators who can AMEN/APPLAUD our truly universal pre-K program. Folks we know or could reach out to. Jessica can help me with message guidance for these folks. But want to have folks to deploy. This is for our national media outreach in particular but also used locally.

Categories:

Education figures – university researchers, previous admin, etc

Political – folks that have been pushing country to provide universal pre-K; national figures

Celebs, Biz leaders, techies— well-known names

Send me the names and we'll get the play going ASAP

We tried to get him to do outreach with a street team several weeks ago with Melissa Russo but he was nervous about something going wrong. There is no guarantee of perfect execution whether it's encampments or street teams but with the right reporter who gets the issues around homelessness like Russo, I think it will be fine.

The play with him is one thing. But the issue about dealing with street homelessness remains a problem even with change of weather. They just go into subway.

Remember that of 15 of so encampment busts only a handful of homeless went to the shelter. So we could be just moving them out of the encampments onto the street.

If he tours an encampment, it should be to demonstrate a new program we have in place to find homes/shelter for the folks there. If we can get that in place, then we can show we are trying to help the individuals, not punish them. Let's get DHS and others to develop that quickly.

Couple of thoughts / questions:

When he tours is it a big outreach push to get these guys in shelter? I assume we are not going in there and just busting people up hence all the agencies and outreach partners?

Could we also couple if with him going out on an overall outreach tour in same neighborhood with the folks who talk people off the street?

More him spending a night hands on the problem talking people into shelter with this as a piece and less what could be perceived as punitive narrative Tony and I think we all want to avoid?

Still sends a signal against encampments etc. maybe do it just with daily news and no tv to start?

Wanted to follow up with you directly on communications proposals for Monday and provide a holistic overview of the week. Know that you'll then discuss with Front Office and make determinations. If you hate this format, I apologize and will re-configure.

Monday

Homeless Encampment Clean Up Operation

Date: Monday, August 30th at 11am

Location: 150th Street & St. Ann's Avenue (south end)– Rae Street & Hegney Place (north end)

Strategy:

- YOU walk with representatives of DHS, DSNY, MOCJ, NYPD, Boom! Health (community service partner) to assess an encampment that is scheduled to be cleaned out this Thursday. There are approximately 12-15 individuals at this site all day long. Debris, including needles and trash, on the ground with tents built up. We are inviting the PC to join.

- We anticipate inviting tier 1 print and TV photographers to cover your visit and plan to pre-position them along the encampment, pending our walk through of the site, to cover you walking the ground flanked by folks and being briefed.
- YOU then are pulled to the side to provide a brief topper to cameras— what you just witnessed and what we are doing about it. We are also inviting the PC.
- 3-5 on-topic questions only. No off topic
- We issue a press release on the encampment work, framing it as YOU assessing the situation and ordering sites be cleaned and enforced. Media will be told that this site will be cleared on Thursday and we expect they will return to watch.

NOTE: You raised earlier the concern about cameras and the spontaneous atmosphere of these walks. We believe that to maximize this opportunity we should have TV-cameras there, but based on your feedback we can limit to just still photogs and no avail. Nothing has been pitched at this time.

Daily News op-ed with homeless focus will run tomorrow

Pre-K Education Twitter Chat

Date: Monday, August 30th, time TBD with scheduling

Location: wherever

Strategy:

- YOU conduct a 10-15 minute twitter chat aimed at parents on the start of school next week.
- Focus is pre-K.
- Could possibly get a question about some of the schools determined not ready to be opened. Answers will be prepped for you. This is our opportunity to have you begin to reach New Yorkers directly rather than through press conferences.

Weekly Communications

Press avail – 2 in community (Bronx homeless encampment walk w/gaggle; affordable housing press conference)

Radio- 2 (Lehrer and Martinez)

Non-traditional -1 (twitter chat)

Off Topic -- 2 (Tuesday Lehrer; Thursday press conference)

Priority Buckets

If he tours an encampment, it should be to demonstrate a new program we have in place to find homes/shelter for the folks there. If we can get that in place, then we can show we are trying to help the individuals, not punish them. Let's get DHS and others to develop that quickly.

Couple of thoughts / questions:

When he tours is it a big outreach push to get these guys in shelter? I assume we are not going in there and just busting people up hence all the agencies and outreach partners?

Could we also couple if with him going out on an overall outreach tour in same neighborhood with the folks who talk people off the street?

More him spending a night hands on the problem talking people into shelter with this as a piece and less what could be perceived as punitive narrative Tony and I think we all want to avoid?

Still sends a signal against encampments etc. maybe do it just with daily news and no tv to start?

If we can rid Times Square of desnudas without having them return, surely we can do the same with people who are not mentally ill and are still refusing shelter.

What worries me is we have no way of moving the homeless off the streets, except to arrest them and put them through the jail, hospital, shelter, street cycle — which Guliani and Bloomberg used to reduce their visibility.

When it starts to get cold, the problem just moves to the subways. We can arrest them there, but is that the plan?

There may be a humane plan in the making about street homeless, and I don't know about it. If there is, we should start talking about it, a long with busting up encampments.

Talking about real solutions also will help mitigate the Mayor's concern about seeming uncaring.

Reducing thread and adding Tony. I think we should do it.

I'll irritate everyone by referencing Tompkins Square Park. Tony - this AM - there were 7 people sleeping in the main grassy area at 7am - so a 5-person reduction from Friday at the same time - but still feels out of control.

I know Ginia Belafonte had a thoughtful column this AM - but I don't think it represents the vast majority of New Yorkers, who believe homelessness is a quality of life issue, and is getting way out of hand.

1. As you know, Chirlane will continue to "head up" mental health (I've cc'ed her and her team here). She will effectively be the Chair of and chief spokesperson for all we do on this topic for the duration. Richard will head the Mental Health Cabinet, meaning the actual day-to-day coordination amongst all the agencies, which requires a deputy mayor's involvement. Pls make sure this is crystal clear in the roll-out

2. The broad idea of the encampment event makes sense to me, but don't wrong it could really backfire. I've cc'ed Rosen and Del Cecato for this piece. The danger here is that it will be interpreted wrongly as an attack on the homeless -- which I would never be party to.

Our problem is that as a team we have all (led by me) absolutely sucked at laying down the predicate on this issue. If over the last two months we had set the record straight effectively, this effort re: the encampment would have seemed natural and smooth. In the absence of framing, it could really come across as desperate and over-the-top.

I really want to hear with Jonathan and John think -- especially Jonathan because of his long experience on this issue. And I really don't want to alienate our true friends and allies on this issue. So if we can do this right, contextualize it right, explain it right and inhibit media sensationalism, I'm all in.

Homeless Encampment Clean Up Operation

Date: Monday, August 30th at 11am

Location: 150th Street & St. Ann's Avenue (south end)– Rae Street & Hegney Place (north end)

- YOU then are pulled to the side to provide a brief topper to cameras—what you just witnessed and what we are doing about it. We are also inviting the PC.

- 3-5 on-topic questions only. No off topic
- We issue a press release on the encampment work, framing it as YOU assessing the situation and ordering sites be cleaned and enforced. Media will be told that this site will be cleared on Thursday and we expect they will return to watch.

NOTE: You raised earlier the concern about cameras and the spontaneous atmosphere of these walks. We believe that to maximize this opportunity we should have TV-cameras there, but based on your feedback we can limit to just still photogs and no avail. Nothing has been pitched at this time.

Sir,

The group consensus is that since we will have service providers who are doing outreach to these clientele that we show a different approach than the past- enforcement and support to work towards long-term, achievable solutions.

However, we recommend scaling back to just Daily news photog and reporter (Jen fermino) which limits media presence while achieving our goal of amplifying your oped today.

We would have the following with you

- kathryn garcia, dsny
- Mindy tarlow, operations
- Gilbert taylor, dhs
- o'neill or fox, nypd

Representatives of Bronx Works- which has been outspoken in support for your approach- and Harm Reduction programs will be there and can brief you.

Advance has told us that it is only safe to view from an overlook. You will not walk the grounds. But it would give you a view of the camps and opportunity to be briefed.

The camps will be cleared on Thursday and we would make clear to Jen this is a strategic response to a complex problem.

ROS

- YOU are greeted by the agencies and community partners
- YOU are briefed on situation
- Daily News photog covers
- YOU do a brief one-on- one with Jen Fermino on site after.

As you may recall, she was quite thoughtful in her coverage after the mentally ill person approached Chirlane at an event and we believe she will treat this respectfully.

We do anticipate some questions on veterans homelessness potentially and will work up QandA.

Please let us know your thoughts. Nothing has been pitched.

Sir,

The group consensus is that since we will have service providers who are doing outreach to these clientele that we show a different approach than the past- enforcement and support to work towards long-term, achievable solutions.

However, we recommend scaling back to just Daily news photog and reporter (Jen fermino) which limits media presence while achieving our goal of amplifying your oped today.

We would have the following with you

- kathryn garcia, dsny
- Mindy tarlow, operations

- Gilbert Taylor, DHS
- O'Neill or Fox, NYPD

Representatives of Bronx Works- which has been outspoken in support for your approach- and Harm Reduction programs will be there and can brief you.

Advance has told us that it is only safe to view from an overlook. You will not walk the grounds. But it would give you a view of the camps and opportunity to be briefed.

The camps will be cleared on Thursday and we would make clear to Jen this is a strategic response to a complex problem.

ROS

- YOU are greeted by the agencies and community partners
- YOU are briefed on situation
- Daily News photog covers
- YOU do a brief one-on-one with Jen Fermino on site after.

As you may recall, she was quite thoughtful in her coverage after the mentally ill person approached Chirlane at an event and we believe she will treat this respectfully.

We do anticipate some questions on veterans homelessness potentially and will work up QandA.

Please let us know your thoughts. Nothing has been pitched.

An excellent plan for the week! Well done

Two concerns:

1. As you know, Chirlane will continue to "head up" mental health (I've cc'ed her and her team here). She will effectively be the Chair of and chief spokesperson for all we do on this topic for the duration. Richard will head the Mental Health Cabinet, meaning the actual day-to-day coordination amongst all the agencies, which requires a deputy mayor's involvement. Pls make sure this is crystal clear in the roll-out

2. The broad idea of the encampment event makes sense to me, but don't wrong it could really backfire. I've cc'ed Rosen and Del Cecato for this piece. The danger here is that it will be interpreted wrongly as an attack on the homeless -- which I would never be party to.

Our problem is that as a team we have all (led by me) absolutely sucked at laying down the predicate on this issue. If over the last two months we had set the record straight effectively, this effort re: the encampment would have seemed natural and smooth. In the absence of framing, it could really come across as desperate and over-the-top.

I really want to hear with Jonathan and John think -- especially Jonathan because of his long experience on this issue. And I really don't want to alienate our true friends and allies on this issue. So if we can do this right, contextualize it right, explain it right and inhibit media sensationalism, I'm all in.

If not, we should consider having officials other than me and BB do this, and then I speak to it after. Pls discuss without me on the thread and come back with a rec. Thanks

Homeless Encampment Clean Up Operation

Date: Monday, August 30th at 11am

Location: 150th Street & St. Ann's Avenue (south end)– Rae Street & Hegney Place (north end)

Strategy:

- YOU walk with representatives of DHS, DSNY, MOCJ, NYPD, Boom! Health (community service partner) to assess an encampment that is scheduled to be cleaned out this Thursday. There are approximately 12-15 individuals at this site all day long. Debris, including needles and trash, on the ground with tents built up. We are inviting the PC to join.
- We anticipate inviting tier 1 print and TV photographers to cover your visit and plan to pre-position them along the encampment, pending our walk through of the site, to cover you walking the ground flanked by folks and being briefed.

- YOU then are pulled to the side to provide a brief topper to cameras—what you just witnessed and what we are doing about it. We are also inviting the PC.
- 3-5 on-topic questions only. No off topic
- We issue a press release on the encampment work, framing it as YOU assessing the situation and ordering sites be cleaned and enforced. Media will be told that this site will be cleared on Thursday and we expect they will return to watch.

NOTE: You raised earlier the concern about cameras and the spontaneous atmosphere of these walks. We believe that to maximize this opportunity we should have TV-cameras there, but based on your feedback we can limit to just still photos and no avail. Nothing has been pitched at this time. Daily News op-ed with homeless focus will run tomorrow

Mayor de Blasio Authorizes Emergency Measure to Aid Homeless People
NY TIMES - Nikita Stewart
<http://mobile.nytimes.com/2015/08/31/nyregion/mayor-de-blasio-authorizes-emergency-measure-to-aid-homeless-people.html?referrer=>

With few beds available in New York City's homeless shelters, Mayor Bill de Blasio has authorized another emergency measure to provide rental assistance to people facing homelessness.

The $10 million initiative is expected to provide aid to as many as 1,000 adults and is modeled on an emergency measure in May to assist families with children, who have been the focus of the administration's recent efforts to reduce homelessness.

While the number of homeless people has fallen since last winter's record of about 60,000, officials concluded that more needed to be done to assist adults without children. In an Aug. 5 count, 16,562 people were living in city homeless shelters. The average vacancy rate at shelters for single adults was 1.1 percent, while the rate at shelters for adult families was 1.29 percent.

The new emergency measure, the Special Exit and Prevention Supplement, will give subsidies to tenants facing eviction, domestic violence survivors timing out of shelters, recovering addicts discharged from treatment and former residents of so-called three-quarter homes.

Mary Brosnahan, executive director of the Coalition for the Homeless, said the new program was an “important step.”

“The numbers have been going down on families, but we’re seeing growing numbers of single adults,” Ms. Brosnahan said. “It’s going to do a lot for single people in the shelters, many of whom are working.”

Based on household size and other factors, the subsidies will allow recipients to rent private apartments long term. But finding apartments within the program’s cap, $1,213 for a single adult, will not be easy. The city has been criticized for years for the poor conditions of private buildings in a temporary assistance program for homeless families.

“Yes, it’s going to be difficult, but I don’t think it’s impossible,” Ms. Brosnahan said.

The city has been trying to recruit landlords to participate in the new rental assistance programs, Steven Banks, commissioner of the city’s Human Resources Administration, said. But he added that many landlords remain bitter about a 2011 decision by Mr. de Blasio’s predecessor, Michael R. Bloomberg, to end a similar subsidy program. “It’s a legacy that we had to work very hard with landlords to wipe away.”

Mr. Banks and Gilbert Taylor, commissioner of homeless services, had asked Mr. de Blasio, a Democrat, to set up the new program and to model it on the Family Eviction Prevention Supplement program, started in May.

The initiatives are part of a broader effort to move people out of shelters and into permanent housing.

Since last fall, the city has been rolling out various rental assistance programs through emergency rules, allowing the city to start the programs before the public-comment period ends.

Councilman Stephen T. Levin, a Brooklyn Democrat who is chairman of the general welfare committee, said expediting the programs is justified. “It’s an emergency, particularly when we see the vacancy rate within the shelter system,” he said. “It’s a much wiser course of action to come up with programs. Time is of the essence.”

Matthew Main, a staff attorney at MFY Legal Services Inc., a nonprofit firm focused on poverty issues, said the new program would greatly help people receiving a state shelter allowance of just $215, an amount that has been unchanged since 1988.

Many of those people end up in three-quarter housing, he said, group homes that are effectively unregulated and have multiplied over the past decade, driven by a mandate to reduce shelter rolls and a dearth of affordable housing.

“A lot of people in three-quarter housing are folks who are down on their luck,” Mr. Main said. “This is essentially a way for people who are simply poor to procure safe housing.”

More than 200 people were removed from three-quarter houses that were shut down for illegal conditions, such as building code violations and overcrowding. They are currently in temporary housing and would likely benefit from the new program.

Importance: High

Hi,

We're planning to have the education speech on Wed, Sept 16.

We are narrowing in on a location in the Bronx (Avi is reviewing for IGA). (Knowledge and Power Preparatory Academy International High School)

We should have vetting confirmation on Monday. We have alternatives in place

I'd like invites to go out this Tuesday since we are WAY behind on getting it out.

Next steps

Advance: can you visit locations on Monday? Need to also confirm location has capability for video if we end up doing a video at start of program and/or photos like during SOTC

Mospe: can you develop an invite and finalize lists for Tuesday AM distro? Marti and I will review the invite IGA/CAU/ Gabrielle: can you review invite lists for additions/deletions, needs?

MPC copied here for any tips from last year

Many thanks!

A New Plan for American Cities To Free Themselves of Wall Street's Control

Arbitrary financial fees are sucking cities and states dry. But they can change the terms if they band together and bargain collectively.

In August 2014, the Los Angeles City Council debated whether to call for the renegotiation of the city's financial deals. A report by the labor-community coalition Fix L.A. found that the city had spent more than twice as much on banking fees in fiscal year 2013 as it had on street services.

To try to balance its budget, Los Angeles had enacted hundreds of millions of dollars in cuts over the previous five years. City jobs had been slashed by 10 percent, flood control procedures had been cut back, crumbling sidewalks were not repaired and alleys were rarely cleared of debris. Sewer inspections ceased entirely; the number of sewer overflows doubled from 2008 to 2013.

The campaign slogan wrote itself: "Invest in our streets, not Wall Street!"

At the city council debate, Timothy Butcher, a worker with the Bureau of Street Services, got up and said, "I don't know a whole lot about high finance. I'm just a truck driver. But I do know, if I go to a bank and they give me a bad deal, I don't deal with that bank any more. And I don't understand why the city can't use the same kind of concept on some of these big banks, saying, 'Hey, help us out or, you know, we're not going to deal with you any more.' "

The City Council approved the resolution unanimously.

It was a blow against both the austerity agenda and the iron grip of Wall Street on American cities. State and local governments in the United States rely on Wall Street firms to put together bond deals, manage their investments and provide financial services. For this, banks charge billions of dollars in fees each year. Public officials believe they have little choice but to cough up. When there are revenue shortfalls, cities typically impose austerity measures and cut essential community services, but Wall Street gets a free pass—payments to banks are considered untouchable.

Public officials assume (wrongly) that financial fees are set in stone because they are based on so-called market rates. However, market rates aren't preordained by God. Banks set them, and public finance officials simply don't demand anything substantively lower.

So, what if cities took a page from the labor movement and bargained collectively over interest rates and other financial deals?

The simple reason why anti-union politicians are waging a war on collective bargaining by workers is that it works: There is power in numbers. The basic idea behind such bargaining is to shift the balance of power in the employer-employee relationship and empower workers to negotiate with owners on a more equal footing.

But collective bargaining does not have to be limited to the workplace. Student organizations such as United Students Against Sweatshops have forced university administrations to negotiate over labor standards for their merchandise vendors. Consumer unions press retailers over issues like pricing and safety standards. Community organizations are able to negotiate community-benefit agreements with major corporations in their cities and win benefits such as local hiring policies and community investment standards.

Similarly, public finance officials in cities, states and school districts across the country could apply collective bargaining practices to their financial relationships with Wall Street. While there is no established mechanism for them to do so, there are some creative options worth exploring. For example, cities could establish a nonprofit or publicly funded agency to set guidelines for municipal finance deals and refuse to do business with any bank that does not comply. (More on this later.)

This may sound pie-in-the-sky, but the reality is that American taxpayer dollars are a tremendous source of bargaining power. Just three U.S. cities — New York, Los Angeles and Chicago— together with their related agencies and pension funds, do nearly $600 billion of business with Wall Street every year, more than the gross domestic product of Sweden. Wall Street wants a piece of that action. If it has to jump through a few hoops to get it, it will. This gives public officials the leverage to demand lower interest rates and fairer terms, freeing up scarce funds for community services like parks, libraries and schools.

Runaway fees

Over the last few decades, the banking industry has shifted its profit model away from interest. Big banks' profits now rely heavily on fees—the money charged for creating loans, packaging them into securities, selling them and servicing them. This structure incentivizes banks to push more complex and expensive deals, like adjustable-rate mortgages and variable-rate bonds, that require fees and add-ons.

Banking fees do not have to bear any relationship to the actual cost of providing services. Banks charge whatever they can get away with, which is why fees have shot up as banks have consolidated and customers' choices have narrowed. For example, in 2007, Bank of America raised its ATM fee for non-customers from $2 to $3. In all likelihood, the bank's costs hadn't suddenly risen 50 percent, despite a spokesperson's claim that the fee hike would offset "significant" expansion and upgrade of its machines. Banks also arbitrarily raised prices on credit enhancements for municipal borrowers after the financial crash.

For cities and states, which deal in large dollar amounts, this nickel-and-dime hits particularly hard. A 1 percent fee on a $200 million bond is a lot more money than a 1 percent fee on a $200,000 mortgage. That explains why the city of Los Angeles paid $334 million in publicly disclosed fees for financial services in fiscal year 2013, according to the Fix L.A. report. This amount did not include principal or interest on any debt, and neither did it include fees that are not publicly disclosed, like the astronomical fees hedge funds and private equity firms charge pension funds to manage investments.

In Illinois, a preliminary analysis by researchers at the Service Employees International Union (SEIU)—full disclosure: where I used to work—found that the state’s pension funds spent approximately $400 million in publicly disclosed fees in 2014 alone. New York City Comptroller Scott Stringer has released a report showing that nearly all of the returns from the city’s five pension funds over the past 10 years—approximately $2.5 billion—have been eaten up by fees. An investigation by the International Business Times found that New Jersey’s pension funds paid more than $600 million in financial fees in 2014.

Every dollar that banks collect in fees from state and local governments and pension funds is a dollar not going toward essential neighborhood services. It’s not just the streets and sewers of Los Angeles. Illinois is teetering on the edge of a government shutdown. Already, Gov. Bruce Rauner has slashed funding for college scholarships for low-income students, taken a hatchet to vital healthcare programs like Medicaid, and cut state funding for CeaseFire, a highly regarded violence-prevention program with a proven track record.

Most public officials still resist acknowledging that these fees are a problem. When Gov. Rauner tried to cut the municipal share of state income tax revenue by 50 percent this spring, the Illinois House of Representatives responded with a first-of-its-kind resolution urging the state to match any such cuts with proportional cuts to financial-service fees. SEIU also proposed a reduction of financial-service fees during its contract negotiations for state workers, but this was roundly rejected by the Rauner administration.

Of course, Rauner has personally profited from these fees in the past. Before deciding to run for office, he was the managing director of a private equity firm that did business with Illinois pension funds, GTCR LLC.

But even public finance officials who don't have direct industry ties typically drag their feet on fee reductions. The Los Angeles City Council's efforts to pressure banks into renegotiating or terminating costly financial deals were met with stiff resistance from the city's financial officers.

There are a number of reasons why finance staff can be reluctant, if not obstructionist, in efforts to curtail banking fees. One is the revolving door between public finance jobs and Wall Street. Another is the fact that public officials can be outflanked by smoothtalking bankers making dishonest and deceptive sales pitches. But perhaps the biggest reason is that officials truly believe they got the best deal they could. Los Angeles's finance staff point out that even though they paid $334 million in fees in 2013 alone, they actually did better than many of their peers.

When Councilmember Paul Koretz called for a vote on the motion in Los Angeles, he skewered the City Administrative Officer's (CAO) office, saying: "Our lack of success in negotiating thus far could partly be a factor of CAO saying that, 'Hey, this is a fine deal and we've done as well on this as anything else we could do.' "

Changing the rules

Under the current system, Wall Street sets the rules of the game and public officials think they have no choice but to play on those terms. They may negotiate around the margins and get a fee lowered by half a percentage point, but they do not typically push back on the illogic of the underlying fee structures.

Cities that consider taking a stand against Wall Street are routinely told that if they do, their credit ratings will be downgraded, and banks and investors will stop doing business with them. In reality, the public finance officials who claim they have no choice but to pay high fees and accept onerous terms from Wall Street banks are like elephants afraid of mice. The notion that Wall Street could sustain a prolonged boycott against a city or state as punishment goes against the very nature of banking. U.S. taxpayer dollars are among the largest pools of capital in the world. If there is money to be made, there will always be a bank that will step in to get that business.

Similarly, threats about credit rating downgrades are baseless. Rating agencies are concerned with a borrower's ability to pay back its bondholders. If anything, negotiating lower fees with banks would free up money and make cities and states less likely to default.

Some cities and states are already blazing the trail. In 2010, then-Massachusetts State Treasurer Timothy Cahill moved state deposits out of Bank of America, Citigroup and Wells Fargo because the banks' credit card operations did not comply with the state's usury law, which caps interest rates at 18 percent.

In 2012, the city of Oakland initiated a boycott of Goldman Sachs because the bank refused to renegotiate a deal that had put the city on the losing side of a risky interest-rate bet costing $4 million in annual fees and payments.

And earlier this year, the Board of Supervisors of Santa Cruz County, Calif., voted not to do any new business for the next five years with banks convicted of felonies. The boycott affects the five banks, including JPMorgan Chase and Citigroup, that pleaded guilty to illegally rigging foreign exchange rates.

These actions are first steps. However, they would be significantly more effective if cities and states joined together. When Oakland—a mid-sized city of 400,000 people—boycotted Goldman Sachs, Goldman didn't flinch. But if several cities, states and school districts banded together and threatened a boycott, the banking behemoth would be forced to take notice.

Power in numbers

In an ideal world, the federal government would establish standards for protecting state and local officials against predatory financial deals. In the same way that there is a Consumer Financial Protection Bureau, there is a dire need for a Municipal Financial Protection Bureau whose top priority would be to protect taxpayers' interests. Even though there are already agencies with oversight over municipal finance—such as the Municipal Securities Rulemaking Board and the Securities and Exchange Commission—protecting cities and states from abuse is not their priority. And they have close ties to the financial services industry.

Because federal regulation has proven woefully inadequate, and the chances of effective congressional action in the near future are slim to none, cities and states need to step up.

If just New York, Los Angeles and Chicago banded together and threatened to withhold their collective $600 billion of potential annual business with Wall Street, they wouldn't have to simply accept the so-called market rates. They have enough bargaining power to set their own.

Together, they could refuse to sign contracts that prevent them from publicly disclosing fees. If they also get their state governments and pension funds on board, they could alter fee structures for things like bond underwriting. They could require any bank that pitches products to sign a fiduciary agreement, meaning they are legally required to put taxpayer interests ahead of their own.

Santa Cruz County Supervisor Ryan Coonerty has already said he is reaching out to other jurisdictions across the country to urge them to join in refusing to do business with felonious banks. If public officials were to coordinate their demands and present a unified front, they could force the banks to take them seriously.

My organization, the Roosevelt Institute's ReFund America Project, works with community-labor coalitions in cities nationwide that are calling for a reduction in bank fees and an end to predatory municipal finance deals. Last summer, ReFund America and Local Progress—a network linking local elected officials with unions and progressive groups—led a small meeting called “A Progressive Vision for Municipal Finance.” We brought together organizers, policy experts and public officials to discuss various proposals for fixing municipal finance. Among those present were four city councilmembers and three representatives from mayors' offices. These officials expressed strong interest in developing a bargaining vehicle that would allow cities to take collective action to stand up to Wall Street.

One idea was the creation of a nonprofit or public agency to set municipal finance guidelines. Individual cities and states could subscribe to these guidelines and the agency would in effect become the gatekeeper for banks wishing to do business with them. The more subscribers the agency had, the more bargaining power it would hold. Strict controls would help ensure the agency remained scrupulously independent of Wall Street. That organization could even be the precursor to a national Municipal Financial Protection Bureau.

People over profit

Together, American cities, states and pension funds hold untold power. If they flex their muscles and organize around coordinated demands, they can radically transform taxpayers' relationship with Wall Street.

In 2012, a community leader from Oakland attended the Goldman Sachs shareholder meeting in New York City and urged CEO Lloyd Blankfein to renegotiate its interest rate swap with the city to avoid library closures and layoffs. He said it was “an issue of morality.” Blankfein responded, “No, I think it’s a matter of shareholder assets.”

This is the mentality that led Rolling Stone’s Matt Taibbi to call Goldman Sachs “a great vampire squid wrapped around the face of humanity, relentlessly jamming its blood funnel into anything that smells like money.”

It’s not just Goldman. All of municipal finance has become an extractive industry, pumping billions away from the communities that need them most. Morality is an externality that financial firms seldom concern themselves with. The financial sector’s fee-based business model is designed to maximize profits, not to protect taxpayers.

Banks may not have a moral compass, but their business contracts with our state and local governments can and should. After all, our cities, states and school districts are not simply fodder for Wall Street’s insatiable greed. Our elected leaders have a duty to protect us from predatory financial practices. Cities and states can force banks to charge drastically lower fees, do away with arbitrary fee structures and eliminate onerous terms that divert billions of dollars away from the most vulnerable members of our society into bonus checks for our nation’s wealthiest few.

Governors in states like Wisconsin, Michigan and Illinois are waging war on collective bargaining and telling taxpayers that empowering publicsector unions robs state coffers, but the real drain on public treasuries is the billions in fees paid to banks every year. And unlike money that goes into workers’ pockets, most of these fees are not recycled back into the local economy but sent to offshore tax havens or invested in complex financial schemes. The irony is that collective bargaining is one of the most effective tools available to public officials who truly want to do right by taxpayers—and cast off Wall Street's tentacles.

Sir,

Back to you on the video and our larger digital education roll-in strategy for the First Day of School on September 9th (we are locking our proposed school visits for you and will send you comprehensive strategy outline for review tomorrow).

Working with our digital and production team and JDC (who strongly supports), we would like to re-pose the video idea presented to you last week, a :30 second video that portrays YOU working in a classroom to ready it for the school year. It will be sent out via email and social channels as an engaging and entertaining video that conveys the message that the Mayor's Office and Schools is ready to begin the 2015-16 school year. We believe it will get good broadcast coverage given its lighter tone and creates the shareable content we've discussed (Click bait!)

Here's the proposed script for shooting on Monday with altered tagline.

Potential Tagline: "NYC Schools. Creating an environment of learning."

Shot list:

- MBDB hangs educational posters on wall.
- MBDB sharpening pencils
- MBDB seated in small chair alphabetizing books
- MBDB crossing room, hurriedly looking for next activity
- MBDB cleaning chalkboard/whiteboard
- MBDB clapping erasers (even if whiteboard erasers)
- MBDB mopping floor or vacuuming carpet
- MBDB Adjusting blinds

The full rollout of digital media begins September 2nd.

Video Concept

. MBDB helps set up a school. It's a bigger ask from the Mayor while eliminating the wildcard of children. It fits his personality. It would be made up of ~20 shots of the Mayor doing tasks to get the school ready:

Decorating a classroom, cleaning a chalkboard, washing floors, testing the bell. Very light tone.

Optional Tagline: "Mayoral Control at Work."

All,

Below you will find a list of our follow up from last week's edu speech meeting along with the current state of that item.

1. Grad rate goal We are to look at what it would take to do an 80% graduation goal for HS including taking longer than 2020 for the goal. Emmy has this, will bring to meeting.
2. College ready goal We have to explain how we think we can double the college ready rate-MBdB was prepared to believe increase by 2/3 but he found 100% increase hard to figure. Ditto
3. 2nd grade specific goal Have to come up with a specific goal for 2nd grade reading-if 2nd grade doesn't have a measure, use 3rd grade as the indicator for 2nd. He said he needs to see "From X to Y in ____ years." Trickier, not there yet.
4. Single shepherd Develop more limited pilot-if we did one community and/or MS and HS only- Draft proposal for CSD 23 \(Brownsville\) 6-12 pilot
5. College grad goal And, college graduation as a goal did not make it. Frankly, this puts much more pressure on DOE to come up with specifics so it's probably a good idea to start circulating the white paper y'all are working on. - may be a separate CUNY/college speech as part of overall comms strategy (see below)
6. AP for all is in. "Thank you, Dean." - what's the cost?
7. I did not hear one way or the other on Algebra for all—need clarity; I think we have cost estimate
8. College Visits We have design for this, OMB working on cost.
9. Need specifics on business partnerships for MS/HS. – need to coordinate with Gabrielle and CYE
10. College Savings Accounts Did not debate in whole group—need to present current state and arguments for/against
11. White paper/backup DOE working from their goals doc
12. Verify this is the highest grad rate and lowest dropout rate we have ever had
13. Logistics Vetting HS options

Big outstanding questions:

There was concern, among several who were at (and several who missed) the meeting that dropping college graduation goal weakens overall speech.

Since college success is still the focus of the effort, perhaps we can revisit all 3 goals—HS graduation, college readiness, and college graduation—today.

Will circulate that doc momentarily.

Republicans Wary of Donald Trump's Populist Tone on Taxes

Photo

WASHINGTON — For years, Republicans have run for office on promises of cutting taxes and bolstering business to stimulate economic growth, pledging allegiance to a Reaganesque model of conservatism that has largely become the party's orthodoxy.

But this election cycle, the Republican presidential candidate who currently leads in most polls is taking a different approach, and it is jangling the nerves of some of the party's most traditional supporters.

The tendency of that candidate, the billionaire developer Donald J. Trump, to make provocative, headline-grabbing speeches has helped obscure an emerging set of beliefs: that he would raise taxes in certain areas, particularly on corporations that he believes do not act in the best interests of the United States.

In recent weeks, Mr. Trump has threatened to impose tariffs on American companies that put their factories in other countries. He has threatened to increase taxes on the compensation of hedge fund managers. And he has vowed to change laws that allow American companies to benefit from cheaper tax rates by using mergers to base their operations outside the United States.

First Draft: Donald Trump, Pivoting Toward Policy, Urges Simpler Tax Code AUG. 11, 2015

Alarmed that those ideas might catch on with some of Mr. Trump's Republican rivals — as his immigration policies have — the Club for Growth, an anti-tax think tank, is pulling together a team of economists to scrutinize his proposals and calculate the economic impact if he is elected.

“All of those are anti-growth policies,” said David McIntosh, the president of the Club for Growth, a group that Republican candidates routinely court. “Yes he's a businessman, but if those are the policies he implements, they'll drive the economy into the ground and we'll see huge drops in G.D.P., and frankly I think it would lead to massive loss of jobs.”

The issue of taxing as ordinary income the compensation of hedge fund managers — a share of investment profits known as carried interest — played prominently during the 2012 presidential election. Financial disclosures revealed that Mitt Romney, the Republican nominee, had paid a relatively low tax rate over the years because he was earning retirement income in such a way from Bain Capital, a private equity firm.

Continue reading the main story

Investment managers generally pay only a 15 to 20 percent capital gains tax on profits earned from their customers holdings, a treatment that Democrats often argue amplifies income inequality. Mr. Trump wants fund managers to “pay up.”

Mr. Trump's ideas are not new. The Obama Treasury Department supports a detailed overhaul of the corporate tax code that involves taxing hedge fund and private equity compensation as ordinary income and sweeping changes to the way U.S. corporations are taxed overseas. Representative Paul D. Ryan of Wisconsin, chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, is determined to produce his own corporate tax overhaul this fall, in part to finance a long-term highway and infrastructure bill. And he has the backing of President Obama, and Senators Rob Portman, Republican of Ohio and Charles E. Schumer, Democrat of New York.

By inserting the issues into the presidential campaign, Mr. Trump has turned an obscure but high-stakes effort on Capitol Hill into a potentially major fight in the national Republican Party.

Mr. Trump's business acumen has been one of his biggest selling points with voters. He promises that his boardroom experience would translate into favorable deals on the global stage and boasts that he cannot be bought by bankers or corporate lobbyists.

"I don't want any strings attached," Mr. Trump often says in his speeches, pointing to the big donations he has declined to take from lobbyists.

Mr. Trump has also threatened to make companies such as Ford "pay a price" for shifting their production to Mexico. And while he claims to be friendly with many of them, he has called hedge fund managers "paper pushers" who tend to get lucky on the road to riches. The populist tone is playing well with a subset of the Republican electorate that is frustrated with the status quo, but there are signs that Mr. Trump is beginning to alienate some in the party's base.

"Those aren't the types of things a typical Republican candidate would say," said Michael R. Strain, a scholar at the conservative American Enterprise Institute, referring to the candidate's comments on hedge funds, support for entitlement spending and the imposing of trade tariffs. "A lot of these things are not things that businesses would be happy about."

Grover Norquist, the founder of Americans for Tax Reform, is holding out hope for Mr. Trump even though Mr. Trump and former Gov. Jeb Bush of Florida are the only leading Republican candidates who have not signed a pledge to not raise taxes. Mr. Trump said last month that he was still considering the pledge and that he had no plans for a net tax increase. His suggestion that he would increase the tax on carried interest, however, has raised eyebrows.

“I would certainly be concerned about how that conversation would continue,” Mr. Norquist said. “Democrats will take that and say, ‘Now that you’ve conceded the principle, let’s go further.’”

While Mr. Norquist said he had no problem with candidates making bold proposals for investing in infrastructure — such as border walls and roads — or the military, he thinks it is important that they detail where they would make requisite budget cuts.

Mr. Trump declined to comment on his economic agenda, and a spokeswoman for his campaign said a tax plan would be rolled out in the next few weeks.

As with many of Mr. Trump’s policy ideas, confusion seems to be keeping interested parties from knowing exactly how to respond. In an interview with Fox News last week, Mr. Trump said a flat tax would be viable improvements to America’s tax system. Moments later, he suggested that a flat tax would be unfair because the rich would be taxed at the same rate as the poor.

“The one problem I have with the flat tax is that rich people are paying the same as people that are making very little money,” Mr. Trump said. “And I think there should be a graduation of some kind.”

Ultimately, he has settled on simplifying the tax code as a sensible first step, saying taxpayers spend too much time and money on their returns. H&R Block, the tax preparation company, should be put out of business, according to Mr. Trump.

“I think it’s tough to really know what he’s thinking about any of this stuff,” said Mr. Strain of the American Enterprise Institute.

Corporate inversions are another issue on which Mr. Trump's positions have been slippery. This practice — companies acquire smaller overseas firms and move their headquarters to countries with lower taxes — has become increasingly popular in the last few years, costing the United States billions of dollars in lost revenue and drawing the ire of Democrats in Congress. In an interview with Time magazine, Mr. Trump called for a crackdown on inversions, but his solution also seemed to suggest giving companies a tax holiday in exchange for repatriating.

On Wall Street, Mr. Trump's attacks on the rich so far have mostly led to eye rolls and a few winces.

Anthony Scaramucci, a managing partner of SkyBridge Capital who supports Gov. Scott Walker of Wisconsin in the Republican presidential race, visited Mr. Trump last week to complain about the way he was talking about hedge fund managers. Still frustrated, Mr. Scaramucci took to Twitter over the weekend to say that Mr. Trump is "misinformed" about the industry and that he and most of his colleagues pay the highest marginal tax rate.

Les Funtleyder, a portfolio manager at E Squared Asset Management in New York, said Mr. Trump was still widely considered to be a long-shot candidate in hedge fund and private equity circles. If his positions on raising taxes on their businesses gain traction, Mr. Funtleyder suggested, then some members of the financial industry will probably form a political action committee or donate to a candidate who would tell their side of the story.

Until then, however, Mr. Trump's tough talk on business remains relatively harmless to the one-percent set.

"He's just hitting all the populist high notes," Mr. Funtleyder said, noting that hedge fund managers are easy targets for politicians. "It is unusual for a Republican to say it.”

Hi Regina,

Thanks for checking in. I think for the background slide it should say:

"Mayor Bill de Blasio and Robert Greenwald on the Crisis of Inequality"

Kindergarten Teachers vs Hedge Fund Managers (or whatever the final title is) and the Brave New Films and TPA logo below that. (TPA Logo attached)

Our department of education is working on a NYC teacher and has promised me an answer by cob tomorrow.

Do you have the next cut of the film and the updated title yet? We are going to work on sending out invitations in the next couple of days.

Sir,

Back to you on the video and our larger digital education roll-in strategy for the First Day of School on September 9th (we are locking our proposed school visits for you and will send you comprehensive strategy outline for review tomorrow).

Working with our digital and production team and JDC (who strongly supports), we would like to re-pose the video idea presented to you last week, a :30 second video that portrays YOU working in a classroom to ready it for the school year. It will be sent out via email and social channels as an engaging and entertaining video that conveys the message that the Mayor's Office and Schools is ready to begin the 2015-16 school year. We believe it will get good broadcast coverage given its lighter tone and creates the shareable content we've discussed (Click bait!)

Here's the proposed script for shooting on Monday with altered tagline.

Potential Tagline: "NYC Schools. Creating an environment of learning."

Shot list:

MBDB hangs educational posters on wall.

MBDB sharpening pencils

MBDB seated in small chair alphabetizing books

MBDB crossing room, hurriedly looking for next activity

MBDB cleaning chalkboard/whiteboard

MBDB clapping erasers (even if whiteboard erasers)

MBDB mopping floor or vacuuming carpet

MBDB Adjusting blinds

The full rollout of digital media begins September 2nd.

Video Concept

. MBDB helps set up a school. It's a bigger ask from the Mayor while eliminating the wildcard of children. It fits his personality. It would be made up of ~20 shots of the Mayor doing tasks to get the school ready:

Decorating a classroom, cleaning a chalkboard, washing floors, testing the bell. Very light tone.

Optional Tagline: "Mayoral Control at Work."

De Blasio takes to Twitter, in effort to reach public

Mayor Bill de Blasio went rogue Monday, unexpectedly taking over his own @BilldeBlasio Twitter account to answer questions from Twitter users.

“Hey New Yorkers, Bill here. The first day school is coming up next week. How are you preparing?” he tweeted midday Monday. He took 11 questions before signing off.

This was de Blasio's first Twitter chat, spokeswoman Amy Spitalnick said. The mayor held a Google Hangout last year.

He ended up fielding some substantive policy questions, but the 140-character limit meant his answers had to be brief.

Asked when the administration’s plan to redevelop in East New York, Brooklyn, will get underway, he offered, “Official public review starts next month. City committing to 1200 new affordable apartments in first phase.”

Asked what he'd do to reverse income inequality, he referred one Twitter user to his One NYC plan.

And he ended up answering just one question about education.

“What will you do to support public schools/teachers/students to fix damage done by the state's damaging policies?” one user, Krista Easton, asked.

“Moved away from over-reliance on high-stakes testing and ended the misleading grading of schools,” de Blasio tweeted, before adding, “We're focused on improving teacher training and retaining high quality educators.”

He answered a handful of lighter questions.

His favorite boardwalk food?

“Funnel cakes, of course!” the mayor said.

Asked his favorite writer or poet, he answered:

“Amongst my favorites are Steinbeck, Camus & of course Dante Alighieri! & my favorite poet is undoubtedly @Chirlane,” he wrote, referring to his wife, who writes poetry.

De Blasio has been on a goodwill tour of sorts recently in an effort to promote his achievements in the face of flagging poll numbers. In the last two weeks, he's made appearances on WNYC and Hot 97 and has written an op-ed in the Daily News defending his record.

De Blasio, who held a Reddit AMA forum in October of 2013 when he was a mayoral candidate, has broken with precedent when it comes to holding regular events where average New Yorkers can ask him questions.

In May, he suggested he might consider holding regular town halls in the way that former mayors Ed Koch, Rudy Giuliani and Michael Bloomberg did, but has not announced any plans to do so since.

Totally agree. Also done in NOLA, DC, heavily charter places perceived to work well with the sector.

Wouldn't want to give them 2nd grade reading DOE schools are actually better there and the interventions DOE is looking at have their own evidence base. But broadly agree that tip of cap is a good idea and there are lots of ways to do it, including the test model reference, enrollment process, and maybe a broad gesture about how we are working and learning together.

I'd like to propose that we offer to include charter schools in our central school enrollment system. So, for families, entering a charter lottery would be exactly as easy as applying for their district school. They would not have to go through a separate process as they do now. They would list 12 choices of elementary school in preference order, including both district and charter, and would be matched with the school they ranked the highest that has a seat for them.

It's a nice "tip of the cap." It also allows us to settle, once and for all, the question of whether the charters are operating with any selection bias, because all families would use exactly the same admissions process. Equity. One system. Etc.

This makes a ton of sense. Wish I'd thought of it.

One idea would be to highlight what a good charter school is doing in the "test model" sense (which is what charters were always supposed to be about anyway) - and demonstrate how we're replicating that/scaling it for traditional public schools... Maybe a way to highlight community schools? Or the second grade reading coach piece?

NYC schools chancellor promises better relationship with charters

DAILY NEWS - Caitlin Nolan and Ben Chapman - August 31, 2015

City schools boss Carmen Fariña promised a better relationship with the city's charter schools on a Monday back-to-school tour.

Traditional public schools start class Sept. 9, but many of the city's 207 charters schools have already begun, including the two Fariña visited with New York City Charter School Center CEO James Merriman.

The Chancellor's visits to Girls Prep Charter School of the Bronx and Growing Up Green Charter School in Queens were a stark contrast from the start of school last year, when the de Blasio administration went to war with the city's largest charter network over its use of public classrooms.

Fariña promised more collaboration and less conflict with the privately run, publicly funded schools.

"There will be a lot of this, this year," Fariña said. "A lot of cooperation and a lot of visiting each other's schools because we have a lot to learn from each other."

Merriman praised Fariña's symbolic visit.

"I think it's great," he said. "The Chancellor has visited a lot of charter schools and I think it sends a great signal."

And he doesn’t understand all this complicated stuff, but –’ So I said, okay so your daddy wouldn’t understand why a hedge-funder in Greenwich, CT is paying 14 percent taxes while he’s working his ass off in the fields paying 28 percent taxes. Well – I swear this is his exact quote, “I’m not going to give the details of carried-interest with you right here. We can debate that another day.” That’s BS. And you know what – and Laura Ingram tweeted this back at somebody yesterday, it said I don’t think anybody in the base is really that concerned about hedge-funders paying the same tax rates that everybody else pays. Republicans are going to hate what Donald Trump wants to do to rich people

WASHINGTON POST - Jim Tankersley

<http://www.washingtonpost.com/news/wonkblog/wp/2015/08/27/republicans-are-going-to-hate-what-donald-trump-wants-to-do-to-rich-people/>

Establishment Republicans don’t like Donald Trump very much, but he does one thing that some of them love: He brags about his money.

It was the first thing Arthur Laffer, the famed supply side economist and informal adviser to much of the GOP field, brought up in a recent interview about the real estate mogul. Laffer dislikes Trump’s support of immigration restrictions and tariffs on imports from China, but he delights in how Trump proclaims, in Laffer’s words, “I’m rich! I’m rich and I love it!”

“He’s not ashamed of it!” Laffer said. “That’s what you want for your kids, isn’t it? He’s just coming out and saying it.”

He contrasted that stance with Florida Sen. Marco Rubio, who often tells crowds about how his Cuban immigrant parents struggled to make ends meet when he was growing up. “They couldn’t make it, is what he’s saying,” Laffer said. “It shows me that he doesn’t hold in honor the economic success that I do. When I look at a rich person, I don’t think, here’s a lying cheating so and so. I think, here’s a guy who made it!”

That’s how Trump sees it, too. But he also sees, in a rich person, something that will absolutely chill establishment conservatives.

He sees someone who should pay higher taxes.

Trump’s fortune is a key part of his appeal to voters. He tells them his prosperity proves he can help America prosper too. “My whole energy, my whole being is going to be to make this country rich,” Trump said in Alabama last week. “In order to make this country great, I have to make it rich again.”

Trump is offering, in a way, an unabashed defense of the spirit behind supply-side tax policies, which seek to reduce tax rates across the board but particularly for the highest earners: You want to be rich, so let the rich guy help you get there. As Laffer said, it appeals to voters' aspirations.

But Trump isn't running as a supply-sider. He's running as a populist. He's not arguing for lower top marginal tax rates or a flat tax, like most of his Republican rivals. He doesn't appear to want to eliminate investment taxes, as Rubio proposes. He wants rich people to pay more.

Here's what he told Bloomberg Politics in a television interview Wednesday:

"I would say that the hedge fund people make a lot of money and they pay very little tax. I'm about the middle class. I want the middle class to be thriving again. We're losing our middle-class. ... I would let people that are making hundreds of millions of dollars a year pay some tax, because right now they're paying very little tax, and I think it's outrageous. I want to lower taxes for the middle class."

Asked if he was proposing to raise taxes on himself, Trump replied: "That's right. That's right. I'm okay with it, ready, willing. And you've seen my statements. I mean I do very well. I don't mind paying some tax. The middle class is getting clobbered in this country. The middle class built this country, not the hedge fund guys. But I know people in hedge funds, they pay almost nothing, and it's ridiculous, okay?"

That doesn't sound like a Republican candidate for ... almost anything, really. It sounds like Warren Buffett, the billionaire who became a public spokesman for President Obama's efforts to raise taxes on the rich.

Economic policymaking in the Obama era has been dominated in part by a knock-down partisan fight over whether couples earning $450,000 or more should pay a top tax rate of 35 percent or 39.6 percent. The next Democratic nominee will almost certainly propose raising that rate even more. The Republican nominee will almost certainly propose to cut it.

Unless, that is, the GOP nominates the richest candidate in its field.

A Top Walker Fundraiser Meets With Trump

WSJ - Reid Epstein

<http://www.wsj.com/articles/a-top-walker-fundraiser-meets-with-trump-1440450463>

One of Scott Walker's top fundraisers met with Donald Trump on Monday and discussed the possibility of leaving the Wisconsin governor's camp to work for the GOP presidential front-runner's campaign, the fundraiser and Mr. Trump said.

Anthony Scaramucci, a national finance co-chairman for Mr. Walker's campaign, said in a phone interview that the two discussed the possibility of his defecting to Mr. Trump but that he told the businessman it wasn't possible.

"He wants to drop Walker and go with me," Mr. Trump said in a phone interview. "He wants to endorse me. He said, 'I want to drop Walker and endorse you.'"

”The meeting between Mr. Trump and Mr. Scaramucci, managing partner of New York-based investment firm SkyBridge Capital, came after the celebrity businessman attacked hedge-fund operators, saying Sunday that they are “getting away with murder.” Each man said the other requested the meeting.

Mr. Scaramucci said that in the meeting, at the Trump Tower in New York, he asked Mr. Trump to stop his rhetorical attacks against hedge funds.

“What I said to him again today is that I love him as a guy, but I’m loyal to Scott Walker,” Mr. Scaramucci said. “That does not detract from my friendship with him, but can he please stop railing on the hedge-fund industry?”

Mr. Trump said he didn’t agree to do that and won’t ease off the industry. “Politics is a dirty and disgusting business and we’re going to clean it up,” he said.

A Walker spokeswoman said: “Gov. Walker is focused on proposing substantive solutions, like his health-care plan last week, to improve the lives of all Americans.”

In an interview Sunday on CBS, Mr. Trump said “the hedge-fund guys didn’t build this country. These are guys that shift paper around and they get lucky.”

Monday’s meeting came less than three hours after Mr. Scaramucci criticized Mr. Trump on the Fox Business Network. Mr. Scaramucci accused Mr. Trump of being “a Democratic plant” for Hillary Clinton and said he is wealthy only because of his father.

“The politicians don’t want to go at Trump because he’s got a big mouth and they’re afraid he’s going to light them up on Fox News and all these places, but I’m not a politician,” he said. “Bring it. You’re an inherited-money dude from Queens County. Bring it, Donald.”

Mr. Trump said Mr. Scaramucci requested the meeting last week after he began the hedge-fund attacks. Mr. Scaramucci said Mr. Trump’s office asked to meet with him Monday morning after he went on Fox Business.

“I watch this guy talking badly about me in the morning, and two hours later he’s in my office telling me I’m the smartest guy he knows,” Mr. Trump said.

Mr. Scaramucci said he met with Mr. Trump in his capacity as a hedge-fund director, not as an emissary of the Walker campaign. “I’m loyal to Scott Walker,” Mr. Scaramucci said. “My opinions are my opinions, they are not the campaign’s opinions. It’s just me being personally offended by his constant attacks on the hedge-fund industry.”

Donor dilemma: If candidates run low on cash, do they exit?

WASHINGTON POST - Jennifer Rubin

<https://www.washingtonpost.com/blogs/right-turn/wp/2015/08/25/donor-dilemma-if-candidates-run-low-on-cash-do-they-exit/>

Following the almost-unheard-of on-the-record tongue lashing from donors The Post reported, word comes of another noisy and unhelpful money man. The Wall Street Journal reports: “One of Scott Walker’s top fundraisers met with Donald Trump on Monday and discussed the possibility of leaving the Wisconsin governor’s camp to work for the GOP presidential front-runner’s campaign, the fundraiser and Mr. Trump said. Anthony Scaramucci, a national finance co-chairman for Mr. Walker's campaign, said in a phone interview that the two discussed the possibility of his defecting to Mr. Trump but that he told the businessman it wasn't possible." They disagree on who called whom and whether Scaramucci wanted to dump Walker, but two things are clear.

First, it's weird for a "loyal" donor of one candidate to call another to tell him to stop saying something. It's not impossible, but weird. Second, it does not help Walker for a donor to be whining to Trump that Trump is being too mean to hedge funds. In this populist election, doesn't Walker want to be the guy tough on Wall Street? It's another inexplicable mess, following the big immigration/birthright mess of his own making.

With word that former Texas governor Rick Perry is not paying staff and saw his Iowa co-chair resign, we begin to see something few pundits will acknowledge. When the money runs out — as it will if candidates miss the top tier debate and/or their polls drop — some will leave the race, likely before the Iowa caucuses. It is one thing if you are rich or have a well-financed super PAC to run some ads. However, for someone not independently wealthy, eventually you have to decide whether you are going to go into personal debt to run a campaign. Most pols won't — or their families smartly won't let them.

There is also the matter of preserving one's dignity and future. If Sen. Rand Paul (R-Ky.) thinks he is heading for a defeat in Iowa, an outcome far worse than his father's, why stick it out? Does Mike Huckabee really want to ruin his brand with a rotten showing in Iowa (potentially), or will he get out to spare himself a bad loss and a big hit to his book sales and speaking fees? It is those sorts of decisions that candidates will have to make, by the end of the year in some cases. In other words, money really does matter if a candidate is doing poorly and can't invest his or her own money to keep an operation going.

What about former senator Rick Santorum (Pa.), who hung out in Iowa until he caught fire in 2012, or Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), who carried his own suitcase to New Hampshire in 2008 when his campaign was flat broke? Well, that is always a possibility, but it takes a candidate who can operate without a net, a lot of hoopla or an entourage. And then, after putting all the chips on the table, the candidate has to win.

It's not clear who will be in the "out of money" boat or how effectively candidates can make use of super PAC funding. But it may very well be that by the end of the year there will be four to six fewer candidates in the race than there are now. That means the race (not to mention the money) will consolidate and the race will start for real.

A look inside Trump's political philosophy

https://www.washingtonpost.com/opinions/donald-trumps-singular-platform/2015/08/25/2d2c76d0-4b5a-11e5-bfb9-9736d04fc8e4_story.html

We're going to have Donald Trump around for a while, which prompts the question: What is Trumpism? Or, to put it more tartly, is there a coherent political philosophy underlying his candidacy?

Spoiler alert — no — but first, a discussion of how long we might be talking Trump. It is no longer inconceivable that Trump could win the GOP nomination — unlikely, but not inconceivable.

One ironic reason is that the wave of super-PAC spending unleashed by Citizens United could end up strengthening Trump and thereby harm the Republican Party. At 20-something percent in a double-digit candidate race, Trump is in a commanding position.

As long as those other candidates stick around, the party can't coalesce around a Trump alternative. Ordinarily — that is, in the world before super PACs — the second- and third-tier contenders would quickly run out of money. But super PACs, with donors willing to write seven-figure checks to their favored candidates, provide the fuel to keep them in the race.

So, time to consider Trumpism.

One way to understand his philosophy is to do what Trump likes to do: Compare him to Ronald Reagan. Whether you agreed with him or not, Reagan had a defined political outlook that shaped his presidency and influenced his party — one that still does. There can be Reaganism without Reagan. There can be no Trumpism without Trump.

That is because Trumpism is not so much a theory of government as a celebration of one individual's claimed capacity to govern. Reagan saw government as a beast that needed to be subdued and shrunken. Trump sees it more as an entity in need of new — guess whose? — management.

Government, in the Trumpian view, is not necessarily bad in itself — it's just run by dummies. He, and he alone, could bring the art of the deal to D.C., browbeating foreign leaders into making better trade pacts, building roads for pennies on the federal dollar, subjugating Congress to his will.

Sure, there are times when Trump sounds typically Republican. "I always like government staying out of business," he told the Hollywood Reporter in response to a question about net neutrality, although he mistakenly characterized the Obama administration policy as "trying to stay out of business."

Asked in the same interview about his views on legislating equal pay for women, Trump seemed to question the entire enterprise.

"I want women to be paid," he said. "But you know when you start tinkering with the free market and you start having mandates put down, it's a very dangerous subject because we're competing against the world."

Note to Trump: We've had "mandates put down" on equal pay since the Civil Rights Act of 1964. Are you questioning the wisdom of that free-market "tinkering"?

Other times, however, Trump sounds like a believer in the kinds of government programs that fellow Republicans want to block-grant, voucherize and means-test.

"Save Medicare, Medicaid and Social Security without cuts. Have to do it," Trump said in his campaign announcement speech. "Get rid of the fraud. Get rid of the waste and abuse, but save it. People have been paying it for years." Leave aside the alluring simple-mindedness of the waste/fraud/abuse solution. This is not a Paul Ryan Republican.

Likewise, Trump on health care, campaign finance and tax policy sounds different, more populist than the GOP establishment. A single-payer health-care system “works in Canada” and “could have worked in a different age” in the United States, he said at the GOP debate.

When it comes to money in politics, Trump sounds more Bernie Sanders than Mitt Romney. “When you give, they [politicians] do whatever the hell you want them to do,” he told the Wall Street Journal.

On taxes, Trump told CBS’s John Dickerson that he would eliminate the carried-interest loophole giving huge tax breaks to hedge-fund managers. “The hedge-fund guys are getting away with murder,” Trump said. “They’re paying nothing and it’s ridiculous.”

Even Trump’s signature issue of immigration has big-government overtones, with authorities corralling those in the United States illegally and efficiently sifting through the familial wreckage to get “the good ones” back.

Trump waves away questions of mammoth cost with typical Trumpian confidence. “It’s called management,” he told ABC’s George Stephanopoulos. “I’m going to get great people that know what they’re doing, not a bunch of political hacks.”

Government, Reagan said at his first inauguration, “is not the solution to our problem; government is the problem.” In Trump’s world, government is not the problem. Government without Trump at the helm is.

Donald Trump is not a traditional Republican — including on some big issues

WASHINGTON POST - Philip Bump

<http://www.washingtonpost.com/news/the-fix/wp/2015/08/30/where-donald-trump-differs-with-republican-party-orthodoxy/>

Donald Trump has rather effortlessly demonstrated that he is not a normal presidential candidate. And with his scatter-shot delineation of where he stands on various issues, he has made something else clear: He’s not a normal Republican.

Given his politically diverse background, the fact that he doesn’t toe every party line shouldn’t be a surprise. What’s unusual is which lines he doesn’t toe — and that he’s leading in the race for the party’s nomination despite it.

Even with his antipathy toward stating policy positions, Trump has dropped enough hints here and there to provide an idea of what he thinks about issues central to the party platform.

At least, that is, as the platform stood during the 2012 election cycle. The GOP’s platform document is a bit out-of-date, as indicated by the prominent image of the chair of the platform committee. (More recent photos of former Virginia governor Bob McDonnell probably include his prisoner number.) But it still offers a general guide for what the party believes, in the party’s own language.

Let’s compare the party’s words to those of the man who is currently best-positioned to be its next nominee, shall we?

Where they differ

Health care

2012 Republican party platform:

The Patient Protection and Affordable Care Act — Obamacare — was never really about healthcare, though its impact upon the nation's health is disastrous. From its start, it was about power, the expansion of government control over one sixth of our economy, and resulted in an attack on our Constitution, by requiring that U.S. citizens purchase health insurance.

Trump, 2016:

During the first Republican debate, Trump defended his past support for single-payer health care — that is to say, health care managed entirely by the government. "As far as single-payer," he said, "it works in Canada. It works incredibly well in Scotland. It could have worked in a different age, which is the age you're talking about here."

That apparently means that he thinks single-payer's time in America has come and gone. He went on to say that he'd like to see a private system. But praise of single-payer in any form is not at all common among leading Republicans.

Taxation

2012 platform:

Taxes, by their very nature, reduce a citizen's freedom. Their proper role in a free society should be to fund services that are essential and authorized by the Constitution, such as national security, and the care of those who cannot care for themselves. ... Our goal is a tax system that is simple, transparent, flatter, and fair.

Trump, 2016:

Trump disagrees with the idea of a flatter tax system. On "Fox & Friends" this week, he said, "The one problem I have with a flat tax is that rich people are paying the same as people that are making very little money. I think there should be a graduation of some kind." Meaning that wealthier people — like him — pay a higher percentage.

He also called for changing tax rules for hedge funds, who he said are "getting away with murder." Protecting hedge-fund managers isn't explicit in the Republican platform, but increasing taxes in any way is generally understood to be anathema.

We'll interrupt here to note what's interesting about these ideas from Trump: They seem likely to be pretty popular among the party's base, though not necessarily in the establishment. Sort of like...

Immigration

2012 platform:

We will create humane procedures to encourage illegal aliens to return home voluntarily, while enforcing the law against those who overstay their visas.

Trump, 2016:

The 2012 Republican platform is nebulous enough that it doesn't conflict much with Trump's aggressive position. That's not an accident; immigration has been a point of tension between the GOP brass and its base for a long time.

But Trump's position is not that the party should "encourage illegal aliens to return home voluntarily" — it is that criminal undocumented immigrants should be deported and that protections against deporting non-criminal immigrants should be lifted. This is not "self-deportation;" it is deportation.

Planned Parenthood

2012 platform:

We oppose using public revenues to promote or perform abortion or fund organizations which perform or advocate it and will not fund or subsidize health care which includes abortion coverage.

Trump, 2016:

In an interview with Sean Hannity on Fox News, Trump said he didn't think funding for Planned Parenthood (a key target of the "fund organizations which perform or advocate it" line above) should necessarily be cut.

Where things are murky

2012 platform:

We support the public display of the Ten Commandments as a reflection of our history and of our country's Judeo-Christian heritage, and we affirm the right of students to engage in prayer at public school events in public schools and to have equal access to public schools and other public facilities to accommodate religious freedom in the public square.

Trump, 2016:

Trump has never claimed to be a particularly religious man, especially by the expected standards of Republican standard-bearers. At a religious gathering in Iowa in July, he said he hadn't ever asked God for forgiveness, which raised some eyebrows. His church says he doesn't show up much. Trump also declined to identify his favorite passage in the Bible when asked, but he has repeatedly called it his favorite book.

Where they agree

Same-sex marriage

2012 platform:

The institution of marriage is the foundation of civil society. Its success as an institution will determine our success as a nation. It has been proven by both experience and endless social science studies that traditional marriage is best for children.

Trump, 2016:

Trump has attended gay weddings but says he opposes the practice — to the extent that he would not support the same-sex marriage of a grandchild.

Gun rights

2012 platform:

We uphold the right of individuals to keep and bear arms, a right which antedated the Constitution and was solemnly confirmed by the Second Amendment. We acknowledge, support, and defend the law-abiding citizen's God-given right of self-defense.

Trump, 2016:

Trump told Ammoland magazine that he is a "Life Member of the NRA and [is] proud of their service in protecting our right to keep and bear arms." Again: This is an area where a vocal part of the Republican base shares Trump's opinion.

2012 platform:

By whatever legislative method is most feasible, Old Glory should be given legal protection against desecration. ... We condemn the actions of those who deny our children the means by which to show respect for our great country and the constitutional principles represented by our flag.

5 good reasons for Jeb Bush to attack Donald Trump

WASHINGTON POST - Jennifer Rubin

<https://www.washingtonpost.com/blogs/right-turn/wp/2015/08/25/5-good-reasons-for-jeb-bush-to-attack-donald-trump/>

As we noted last week, Jeb Bush has decided to go on the offensive and go after Donald Trump. Bush turned it up a notch on Monday, visiting the border with Mexico and repeating his self-evident point that Trump's plan to shred the Constitution and round up 11 million people is at the very least "unrealistic."

The mainstream media have figured out that Bush's strategy is a good way to peel off ideological conservatives from Trump and to show that Bush can throw a punch. There is, however, more to this than that. Let's consider the other benefits of Bush's Trump attack.

First and foremost, virtually every other candidate is being drowned out. Already overshadowed by Trump, those not involved in the Bush-Trump conversation get little coverage. If some of the more electable contenders see a drop-off in coverage, polling and fundraising — and worse, lose a spot in one or more fall debates — that's to Bush's benefit. Bush has a much better chance of getting the nomination if he and Trump — rather than, say, he and Sen. Marco Rubio (R-Fla.) — are the last men standing. Moreover, Bush really is to Trump's right on health-care reform (Bush never pushed for a single-payer plan), foreign policy and abortion (Bush favors defunding Planned Parenthood).

Second, just as Trump helped attract voters to the first debate, where they could at least get a glimpse of the other contenders, Bush draws many more conservative eyeballs when involved in the Trump duel than he might otherwise. Team Bush is hoping that conservatives who think they know him will see what Bush is actually advocating and see a more tough-minded pol than they expected. So long as Bush keeps it on the issues and what Trump has said or stood for, rather than generic indictments of his impact on the GOP, Bush will be at an advantage.

Third, this might get Bush loosened up for the next debate. He made no errors in the first debate, but he surely was not at ease. If he gets into the habit of throwing some punches, interacting combatively with the media (he told them to “chill” on use of the term “anchor babies”) and sharpening his arguments against the ideologically incoherent Trump, he may have a stronger outing next time.

Fourth, sucking Trump into a debate on real issues is going to help burst his bubble. On Monday, Trump first sounded open to a flat tax, but soon was sounding more like a Democrat in arguing for higher taxes on the rich and hikes on hedge funds. That is fodder for negative ads against Trump and material for the debate. If Trump actually has to engage rationally on the issues, he’ll be at an extreme disadvantage.

Fifth, it gives the media something to do other than cover right-wing griping about Bush or Bush dealing with his family legacy. “Bush hits Trump” is much better than “Bush struggles with Iraq questions.” It is a long, long race, and the media will do their best to come up with negative storylines unless Bush gives them something to cover. Now he is doing just that.

The success of this tactic may not be immediately evident, especially with so many candidates in the race. But if non-Trump candidates find their poll numbers dropping and fundraising drying up, the Bush counterattack on Trump may get some of the credit. (The more other candidates have to spend just to keep in low single digits, the less chance they will have when we get around to casting votes.) Moreover, if Bush’s next performance is an improvement over his first outing, the sparring he is now doing might be responsible. And most important, if Trump’s appeal especially with genuine conservatives lags, then Bush’s strategy will have played its part. We will see whether Bush keeps it up. If he does, it will be a sign that it’s working.

EXCLUSIVE: Summer jobs for city kids surged in 2015

LISA L. COLANGELO, BEN CHAPMAN NEW YORK DAILY NEWS 08/31/2015 2:30 AM ET AMY SUSSMAN/GETTY IMAGES

More Big Apple youths landed city-funded summer jobs in 2015 than at any other point in the program's 50-year history, Department of Youth and Community Development figures show.

A whopping 54,263 city youths age 14-24 landed paid summer gigs lasting up to 6 weeks through the Summer Youth Employment Program that ended earlier this month, commissioner Bill Chong said. That's up from 47,126 youngsters in 2014.

Chong said a $12 million boost in city funds for the program -- bringing its budget to nearly $79 million-- fueled the employment explosion. The program connects youths with minimum wage jobs at private companies, non-profits and city agencies.

But the lessons learned on the job count for more than the spending cash they generate, Chong said.

"Younger youths and those who have never worked before learn the importance of showing up on time and working with other people," Chong said. "For the older youths, it's about lining up the work experience that they're interested in."

More than 130,000 applicants applied for the program this year. Participants were selected through a lottery system.

Khaleel Jones admitted he was a little nervous his first day working the floor at the Modell's Sporting Goods in Fresh Meadows.

"This is my first retail job," said the 18-year-old from Rosedale, who is heading into his senior year at Campus Magnet High School. "I didn't know what to sell and I'm not good at talking to people publicly."

But he credits his co-workers with helping him gain confidence and knowledge. He aced two "mystery shopping" tests by an anonymous Modell's employee and impressed his bosses enough to earn him a part-time job after the program ended.

“Working here has taught me a lot of things,” said Jones, who is making careful plans to juggle the job with his schoolwork and football practice. He’s an offensive lineman with the Campus Magnet Bulldogs. “I’m confident talking to people now and I know what to do in my workspace.”

Ed Cohen, general manager of the store, said he was impressed with Khaleel and his fellow workers from the summer jobs program.

“He was hungry to learn and he used his knowledge,” said Cohen. “Khaleel was here just three weeks when he was tested by a mystery shopper and received a 100. His customers are well taken care of.”

Lets try for tomorrow afternoon.

Sooner the better.

In advance of call

1. Who will draft press release, you guys or us?
2. Who should rough out blog for me and mayor?
3. Re nyc press, any opportunities for process piece? Ie, how did this collaboration come about, what is goal, etc.

And anything else to get us some press?

Subject: Follow up Call for Sept 10 Event

Hi All,

Think it would be helpful for everyone to jump on a call to talk through next Thursday's screening. Including Marti from the Mayor's Comms team and Carla from the Special Events office, but please add anyone else on this chain who you think needs to weigh in on press/logistics.

Do folks have time tomorrow afternoon or Thursday AM?

Let me know what works.

Thanks,
Hayley

Lets try for tomorrow afternoon.

Sooner the better.

In advance of call

1. Who will draft press release, you guys or us?
2. Who should rough out blog for me and mayor?
3. Re nyc press, any opportunities for process piece? Ie, how did this collaboration come about, what is goal, etc.
And anything else to get us some press?

Subject: Follow up Call for Sept 10 Event

Hi All,

Think it would be helpful for everyone to jump on a call to talk through next Thursday's screening. Including Marti from the Mayor's Comms team and Carla from the Special Events office, but please add anyone else on this chain who you think needs to weigh in on press/logistics.

Do folks have time tomorrow afternoon or Thursday AM?

Let me know what works.

Thanks,
Hayley

Looks like over 40% increase in homeless pop under Rudy. Can get City #s from DHS -

Per Coalition's #s (always higher than City) - Jan 1994 is 23,526

Per City - January 1, 2002 33,194.

Per City - Jan 1, 2014 was 50,689

Sir,

Update on Late Night with Seth Meyers.

YOU will be part of the show with Neil Patrick Harris (promoting his new show on the network). YOU will be the second guest, but they've also asked that you tape an extra bit. I'm checking with scheduling on feasibility given that it would require probably an additional 45 minutes of your time that evening (5pm). But wanted to gauge your interest level as well. It does hit our core campaigns and then is a little "politeness" type campaign.

Am discussing the interview angle with the show as well.

Thanks,
Andrea

A MESSAGE FROM MAYOR BILL DE BLASIO
(MAYOR DE BLASIO)

V.O.
And now a message from New York City Mayor Bill de
Blasio.

BILL DE BLASIO IS SEATED IN

THE SECOND CHANCE THEATER SET
WHERE SETH SITS.

MAYOR DE BLASIO

Hello, I'm Bill de Blasio,
Today I'd like to talk to the citizens of New York about some of the great strides
we've made as a city: Housing
is more affordable than ever,
our universal pre-kindergarten program is strengthening the city's education system, and every day we are working harder to increase transparency in city government.

TITLE HERE 1

BEAT.

But one message I would like to impress upon all New Yorkers is this: Look up from your damn phones. Seriously.
What the hell are you doing?
This isn't downtown Wichita.
It's New York City. People need to get where they need to go. The last thing they want is some oblivious ding dong
standing at the top of the subway stairs watching
Transformers on his cell
phone. Hey ding dongs, I got one word for you: Move!

BEAT.

Speaking of the subway, New York City averages 5.6 million subway passengers each and every day. Don't be the guy that keeps his 50-pound back pack on. Come on, man. Take it off and put it in between your feet. It's common sense. And I swear to God, if I see another standing
pregnant woman on the subway,

I'm gonna rip somebody's arms
off. And I can do it, too. I'm like 8 feet tall and I can bench the Chrysler Building.
BEAT.

The bottom line is this: We have to share this city so be considerate and treat everyone
with respect. In other words, pull your head out of your ass.

BEAT.
Goodnight, and God bless New York City.

Reminder on the script... we should cut the housing line & say something like "we're on the way to building more affordable housing than ever before" or something like that... we should NOT say that housing is more affordable than ever (because nobody believes that)

Think it would be helpful for everyone to jump on a call to talk through next Thursday's screening. Including Marti from the Mayor's Comms team and Carla from the Special Events office, but please add anyone else on this chain who you think needs to weigh in on press/logistics.

Do folks have time tomorrow afternoon or Thursday AM?

Let me know what works.

Two great opportunities to help TPA get back up and running leading into the forum. Both would help further the local work you're doing on income inequality and give us something to push out nationally.

We're in the process of putting together the September and October message calendar (including the forum). I would like sign off to move forward giving them times. TPA would handle both directly:

1. Chris Hayes still would like to interview with MBDB. He would like to do an extended interview with him. 30-45 minutes. It could be in studio or a walk and talk. The main subject: income inequality and his tenure. Timeline: MID SEPTEMBER.

From Chris:

"The Mayor and I should an extended interview"..."yes, but also: EVERYTHING. Like, I'm a better, fairer, better read interlocutor on his entire tenure so far than a lot of the idiocy I'm seeing, and say this as someone who (like everyone) has more than my fair share of criticisms of the Mayor."

2. Sirius interview with Ari Havt Rabin Sirius- the letter below is the invite and the topic: TPA, specifically income inequality. He could highlight his bona fides and work in the city. TIMELINE: OCTOBER

SiriusXM Progress would like to host a special event featuring Mayor Bill De Blasio to highlight his work promoting the progressive agenda. This exclusive event would take place in the Fall at the SiriusXM's studios in New York City. The town hall-style event would feature Mayor De Blasio taking questions from host Ari Rabin-Havt and an intimate studio audience comprised of New York City SiriusXM subscribers.

SiriusXM's event with Mayor Bill De Blasio is part of SiriusXM's ongoing effort to have iconic figures and entertainers sitting down with studio audiences comprised of SiriusXM listeners. Previous SiriusXM specials have featured Vice President Al Gore, Senator Kristen Gillibrand, Cardinal Timothy Dolan, Senator Tom Harkin, Senator Olympia Snowe, Bruce Springsteen, Bud Selig, Harry Belafonte, Taylor Swift and many others.

After the broadcast on SiriusXM, the discussion with Mayor De Blasio will be available on SiriusXM On Demand for subscribers listening via the SiriusXM Internet Radio App for smartphones and other mobile devices or online at siriusxm.com.

SiriusXM is the world's largest radio broadcaster measured by revenue and has more than 27 million subscribers. Sir,

Update on Late Night with Seth Meyers.

YOU will be part of the show with Neil Patrick Harris (promoting his new show on the network). YOU will be the second guest, but they've also asked that you tape an extra bit. I'm checking with scheduling on feasibility given that it would require probably an additional 45 minutes of your time that evening (5pm). But wanted to gauge your interest level as well. It does hit our core campaigns and then is a little "politeness" type campaign.

Am discussing the interview angle with the show as well.

Thanks,
Andrea

A MESSAGE FROM MAYOR BILL DE BLASIO
(MAYOR DE BLASIO)

V.O.
And now a message from New York City Mayor Bill de
Blasio.

BILL DE BLASIO IS SEATED IN
THE SECOND CHANCE THEATER SET
WHERE SETH SITS.

MAYOR DE BLASIO
Hello, I'm Bill de Blasio,
Today I'd like to talk to the citizens of New York about some of the great strides
we've made as a city: Housing

is more affordable than ever,
our universal pre-kindergarten program is strengthening the city's education system, and every day we are working harder to increase transparency in city government.

BEAT.

But one message I would like to impress upon all New Yorkers is this: Look up from your damn phones. Seriously.
What the hell are you doing?
This isn't downtown Wichita.
It's New York City. People need to get where they need to go. The last thing they want is some oblivious ding dong
standing at the top of the subway stairs watching
Transformers on his cell
phone. Hey ding dongs, I got one word for you: Move!

BEAT.

Speaking of the subway, New York City averages 5.6 million subway passengers each and every day. Don't be the guy that keeps his 50-pound back pack on. Come on, man. Take it off and put it in between your feet. It's common sense. And I swear to God, if I see another standing
pregnant woman on the subway,
I'm gonna rip somebody's arms
off. And I can do it, too. I'm like 8 feet tall and I can bench the Chrysler Building.

BEAT.

The bottom line is this: We have to share this city so be considerate and treat everyone

with respect. In other words, pull your head out of your ass.

BEAT.
Goodnight, and God bless New York City.

Will do.

This last part is heart-breaking, and says a lot about the human side to the numbers.

While attending high school in the mid-1990s, Derrell Odom worked at KFC, earning $5.50 an hour. That's the equivalent of $8.61 today.

After two years of college, two military tours in Iraq and other jobs, he is back working as a cook at an Atlanta location of the fried chicken chain. Two decades after his first stint at KFC, his hourly pay now is only $7.25 an hour.

That is barely enough to support himself, let alone his fiancée and two sons. "I have leadership skills and led missions in Iraq," Mr. Odom said. "Right now, I'm trying to survive."

Low-Income Workers See Biggest Drop in Paychecks

NEW YORK TIMES - Nelson D. Schwartz - September 2, 2015

Despite steady gains in hiring, a falling unemployment rate and other signs of an improving economy, take-home pay for many American workers has effectively fallen since the economic recovery began in 2009, according to a new study by an advocacy group that is to be released on Thursday.

The declines were greatest for the lowest-paid workers in sectors where hiring has been strong — home health care, food preparation and retailing — even though wages were already below average to begin with in those service industries.

“Stagnant wages are a problem for everyone at this point, but the imbalance in the economy has become more pronounced since the recession,” said Irene Tung, a senior policy researcher at the National Employment Law Project and co-author of the study.

Jasmin Almodovar, a home health care aide in Cleveland, knows all about that.

She has worked for the same health care agency since 2003, and for the first four years she received an annual wage increase of 25 cents an hour. But since 2007, her hourly pay has been stuck at $9.50 an hour.

“I’ve asked for raises several times and each time I get the runaround,” said Ms. Almodovar, who is licensed by Ohio as a nurse’s assistant. Bills for natural gas, electricity, food and other necessities have gone up since her last raise, she noted, leaving little extra money for her and her 12-year-old son.

In many ways, Ms. Almodovar’s predicament encapsulates the contradictions evident each month when the government reports the latest figures on hiring and unemployment.

And the report by NELP, a left-leaning research and advocacy group, underscores why so many Americans are still angry about the state of the economy and with what they see as the inability of Democratic and Republican leaders alike in Washington to do anything to improve living standards for many ordinary workers.

One explanation may lie in the findings of another study released on Wednesday by the Economic Policy Institute, also a liberal research group. Its report showed that even as labor productivity has improved steadily since 2000, the benefits from improved efficiency have nearly all gone to companies, shareholders and top executives, rather than rank-and-file employees.

Labor Department data released on Wednesday indicated that productivity in the American economy in the second quarter rose at an annual rate of 3.3 percent, the biggest quarterly gain since late 2013 and much better than first estimated.

The Labor Department's next batch of data on hiring and unemployment, for the month of August, is due out on Friday. Economists are looking for a gain of roughly 220,000 jobs, and for the unemployment rate to dip slightly to 5.2 percent.

Friday's jobs report is especially significant because it is the last one before Federal Reserve policy makers meet in mid-September to decide whether to go ahead with or delay their long-telegraphed move to raise short-term interest rates from near zero.

The fall in the unemployment rate from a postrecession high of 10 percent is certainly good news, Ms. Tung said, but NELP's analysis showed that once inflation was taken into account, median wages across all occupations fell by 4 percent between 2009 and 2014.

Wage declines in the lowest-paid occupations were much worse, dropping 8.9 percent for restaurant cooks and 6.2 percent for home health aides.

Along with stagnant or falling wages, one of the most persistent complaints about the current economic expansion is that many of the jobs created so far have been low-paying ones. That has changed recently, with more hiring in better-paying fields like business and professional services.

An earlier NELP study was criticized by economists for exaggerating the extent of the so-called low-wage recovery. Ms. Tung said the analysis in the report to be released on Thursday was different from the earlier report, focusing on actual wage trends within occupations, not the proportion of jobs created in different fields.

NELP's findings come at a time when income inequality and the failure of many workers to gain ground during the recovery are coming to the political fore. Candidates from both parties have sought to address the worries of middle-income Americans, while trying not to be too closely identified with Wall Street and other symbols of corporate America.

The past year has been the best for the job market since the end of the recession. Employers have added, on average, 243,000 people to their payrolls each month. That would normally constitute a "hot" job market, said Torsten Slok, chief international economist for Deutsche Bank Securities in New York.

"When you see all those jobs being added per month, you think, 'Come on, how can this be bad?,'" Mr. Slok said. "But there has been a lot of pain and suffering, and people have been losing their skills or have not been able to re-skill."

The roots of wage stagnation are deep, according to Mr. Slok.

Some of it is linked to what he calls the “glacial changes” wrought by macroeconomic forces like automation, demographics and globalization.

Other factors are specific to the American economy, including the real estate boom and bust, consumer debt levels and continuing slack in the labor market because of relatively low demand compared with the still-large numbers of people who are looking for work or would return to the labor force if they had a better chance of finding a worthwhile job.

For Ms. Almodovar, 36, acquiring new credentials and skills is a big obstacle.

When she talked with her employer’s human resources department about how to increase her long-frozen salary, their advice was to go back to school. Although Ms. Almodovar took the G.E.D. test and earned the equivalent of a high school diploma in her late 20s, taking classes would be a tough proposition now.

“I’m living with roommates, and if I don’t go to work, I don’t get paid,” she said. “Even one day makes a big difference.”

Many other workers in some low-paid sectors are worse off than they were a couple of decades ago.

While attending high school in the mid-1990s, Derrell Odom worked at KFC, earning $5.50 an hour. That’s the equivalent of $8.61 today.

After two years of college, two military tours in Iraq and other jobs, he is back working as a cook at an Atlanta location of the fried chicken chain. Two decades after his first stint at KFC, his hourly pay now is only $7.25 an hour.

That is barely enough to support himself, let alone his fiancée and two sons. “I have leadership skills and led missions in Iraq,” Mr. Odom said. “Right now, I’m trying to survive.”

Hi All,

Think it would be helpful for everyone to jump on a call to talk through next Thursday's screening. Including Marti from the Mayor's Comms team and Carla from the Special Events office, but please add anyone else on this chain who you think needs to weigh in on press/logistics.

Do folks have time tomorrow afternoon or Thursday AM?

Let me know what works.

Thanks,
Hayley

Can we add to the invite that capacity/seating is limited and RSVP is required to attend?

Once we get all of our lists together, we are going to send out to a few thousand people, so I don't want there to be any issue if we do hit capacity and have to turn people away at the door.

Hi All,

Think it would be helpful for everyone to jump on a call to talk through next Thursday's screening. Including Marti from the Mayor's Comms team and Carla from the Special Events office, but please add anyone else on this chain who you think needs to weigh in on press/logistics.

Do folks have time tomorrow afternoon or Thursday AM?

Let me know what works.

Thanks,

Hi All,

Think it would be helpful for everyone to jump on a call to talk through next Thursday's screening. Including Marti from the Mayor's Comms team and Carla from the Special Events office, but please add anyone else on this chain who you think needs to weigh in on press/logistics.

Do folks have time tomorrow afternoon or Thursday AM?

Let me know what works.

Thanks,

Bryan characterizes the story as “tough neutral,” says that no one is going to walk away from this piece thinking that the Mayor is doing a great job or a bad job. The story opens with some judgment on tardiness, perception that the Mayor is disengaged from running the city, but he says we come back hard on those critiques. Of note is that Bryan told me that we’re going to be irritated by what’s in quotes, not by what he wrote.

The story will say that an awful lot of unpopularity comes from whites, wealthy and conservative outlets like the Post. Then they’ll ask the question, so which is it? Is Mayor disengaged or should we give him the benefit of the doubt because he’s putting so much emphasis on helping the “have nots,” a population that’s been ignored for 20 years? There is still a good section about what the Mayor is like as a person – to include the Subway ride and color from the shadow day.

It’s still an introduction of the Mayor, but the progressive theme he talked about is no longer a major part of the story. That said, there is still a line in the story that says Mayor is the only progressive worth watching, and there is a small section where he makes the case that it matters how Mayor does and what you think of him because he is a significant national figure.

The Cuomo section is the last 20 percent of the story and will be a “non-issue” for us, per Bryan. Cuomo’s staff will obviously read between the lines when they see the quotes attributed to others, but he told me that he realizes now that the June interview was not as a meaningful moment as he had originally thought, so he didn’t put too much into this section.

Mayor should know that the story was heavily edited – “written by committee” to use Bryan’s exact words – so that helps to explain why the final product isn’t going to look like what he told us and the Mayor the week he spent with us.

Bryan doesn’t know the headline but says we’ll have a double photo of the Mayor on the steps of Gracie and a full page family portrait.

In terms of timing, he said that it could be leaked as early as Monday, but Tuesday or Wednesday is more likely. FWIW, Bryan said he doesn’t know what the Post will pick up. Knowing this timeline, we’ll have to him to respond to criticism during our FDOS media blitz with something like “For those who think I’m disengaged or tardiness is a problem, today is the day that we have 65k four year olds going to free, full day pre-k. That’s more than the entire public school population of the city of Boston (or Detroit, Sacramento, Seattle, El Paso).”

<http://vignette4.wikia.nocookie.net/trollpasta/images/d/db/U-mad-bro.jpg/revision/latest?cb=20140610192555>

BUT, in the interest of message discipline, maybe we just retweet our own original tweet & say something like "ICYMI: Here's the fake cover that has @NYPost all worked up this morning."

OR, you could really rub it in, and say "Here's the fake cover that has @NYPost all worked up." Post this:
<http://www.thesmokinggun.com/sites/default/files/imagecache/750x970/documents/0706041post1.jpg>

And then say: "Whoops. Not that one. This one." And then post the mock-up from Wednesday night.

Ok, we have worked this out, but the Mayor has a hard departure from PACE at 5:30PM, and should leave a few minutes before that to be safe. We have found a NYC K teacher who is a woman, and we are doing a final vet on her.

He's great, but very close to the Mayor and I am always thinking about diversity. The three suggestions below are diverse and not immediately associated with the Mayor while still on board with the agenda. If you feel strongly about James Parrot, I'm fine. Let me know if you want me to put him through vet.

Ok, we have worked this out, but the Mayor has a hard departure from PACE at 5:30PM, and should leave a few minutes before that to be safe. We have found a NYC K teacher who is a woman, and we are doing a final vet on her.

Hello All

I will be the point person on press for Brave New Films.

The draft press release will be coming shortly for your review/edits. But I did have a few quick questions about press leading to and day of the event:

- We are more than happy to send out the press release and pitch to our contacts. However, we rarely have NY specific releases so that's not really our world. Are there any press lists/contacts you all have and would like to share to ensure full coverage of the event in NY media?
- For clarification, both offices will be sending out the press release, correct?
- Will there be an official photographer on site? If so will he/she be roaming or will they just be taking official pictures? Important for us to know.

Thanks everyone! Looking forward to a great event!

New York City Mayor Bill de Blasio Teams Up With Brave New Films to Take on Tax Breaks for the Wealthy in Premiere of New Short Film: Hedge Fund Billionaires vs. Kindergarten Teachers: Whose Side Are You On?

Mayor's office and production company create film demanding closure of the carried interest loophole which allows billionaires to be taxed at lower rates than kindergarten teachers.

Culver City, California (September 8, 2015) - Production company Brave New Films, headed by award winning filmmaker Robert Greenwald, has released a new short film demanding the closure of the carried interest tax loophole. The film, premiering at a private event at Pace University headed by Mayor Bill de Blasio, addresses that while the top 25 hedge fund managers make more annually than all of America's kindergarten teachers combined, those same hedge fund managers are also taxed at a lower tax rate. Mayor de Blasio and Greenwald find the loophole appalling and are calling on all 2016 presidential candidates to pledge to end it within their first 100 days in office.

"It is unacceptable that the uber-wealthy have been able to influence the law to work in their favor," said director of the film and Brave New Films President Robert Greenwald. "While teachers around the nation are struggling to make ends meet, doing one of the most noble professions out there, billionaire hedge fund managers – who make money off of things like the housing crisis and for-profit prisons - are claiming they deserve massive tax breaks."

Quote from de Blasio's office.

The six-minute film will have its premiere screening on Thursday, September 10th, 2015 in the Schimmel Theatre at Pace University. On hand to give remarks will be both the Honorable Mayor Bill de Blasio, as well as filmmaker Robert Greenwald. The event begins at 4:30 pm EST.

Brave New Films is a non-partisan, non-profit, 501(c)(3) organization that carries out the Brave New Films mission by creating and distributing educational films. Its mission is to champion social justice issues by using a model of media, education, and grassroots volunteer involvement that inspires, empowers, motivates and teaches civic participation and makes a difference.

Ok, we have worked this out, but the Mayor has a hard departure from PACE at 5:30PM, and should leave a few minutes before that to be safe. We have found a NYC K teacher who is a woman, and we are doing a final vet on her.

Carla, did you have any luck reaching out to Krugman, Stiglitz, or Alex Wagner?

Hello All

I will be the point person on press for Brave New Films.

The draft press release will be coming shortly for your review/edits. But I did have a few quick questions about press leading to and day of the event:

- We are more than happy to send out the press release and pitch to our contacts. However, we rarely have NY specific releases so that's not really our world. Are there any press lists/contacts you all have and would like to share to ensure full coverage of the event in NY media?
- For clarification, both offices will be sending out the press release, correct?
- Will there be an official photographer on site? If so will he/she be roaming or will they just be taking official pictures? Important for us to know.

Thanks everyone! Looking forward to a great event!

Vanessa

I think this is a good plan.

We may want to think about giving Dave Evans an exclusive on the Pre-K hit - maybe promise him one Q on Vanity Fair... That way, we'd still guarantee that we have a hit on best-watched news show on Pre-K - if/when the tabloids decide to do their thing & cover only VF...

My recommendations

- Close read and rebut by staffers of any inaccuracies, falsehoods
- Line up validators if it spins out – and look to see if we can harness anything into a positive discussion (a la Chirlane and working motherhood)
- Mayor stays high level --- interesting folks say these things when we just had safest summer in 20 years and upwards of 70K 4 year olds are starting pre-K this week thanks to my pre-k for all program

Bryan characterizes the story as “tough neutral,” says that no one is going to walk away from this piece thinking that the Mayor is doing a great job or a bad job. The story opens with some judgment on tardiness, perception that the Mayor is disengaged from running the city, but he says we come back hard on those critiques. Of note is that Bryan told me that we’re going to be irritated by what’s in quotes, not by what he wrote.

The story will say that an awful lot of unpopularity comes from whites, wealthy and conservative outlets like the Post. Then they’ll ask the question, so which is it? Is Mayor disengaged or should we give him the benefit of the doubt because he’s putting so much emphasis on helping the “have nots,” a population that’s been ignored for 20 years? There is still a good section about what the Mayor is like as a person – to include the Subway ride and color from the shadow day.

It’s still an introduction of the Mayor, but the progressive theme he talked about is no longer a major part of the story. That said, there is still a line in the story that says Mayor is the only progressive worth watching, and there is a small section where he makes the case that it matters how Mayor does and what you think of him because he is a significant national figure.

The Cuomo section is the last 20 percent of the story and will be a “non-issue” for us, per Bryan. Cuomo’s staff will obviously read between the lines when they see the quotes attributed to others, but he told me that he realizes now that the June interview was not as a meaningful moment as he had originally thought, so he didn’t put too much into this section.

Mayor should know that the story was heavily edited – “written by committee” to use Bryan’s exact words – so that helps to explain why the final product isn’t going to look like what he told us and the Mayor the week he spent with us.

Bryan doesn’t know the headline but says we’ll have a double photo of the Mayor on the steps of Gracie and a full page family portrait.

In terms of timing, he said that it could be leaked as early as Monday, but Tuesday or Wednesday is more likely. FWIW, Bryan said he doesn't know what the Post will pick up. Knowing this timeline, we'll have to him to respond to criticism during our FDOS media blitz with something like "For those who think I'm disengaged or tardiness is a problem, today is the day that we have 65k four year olds going to free, full day pre-k. That's more than the entire public school population of the city of Boston (or Detroit, Sacramento, Seattle, El Paso)."

Subject: September 10 Event Press Check In

Hello All

I will be the point person on press for Brave New Films.

The draft press release will be coming shortly for your review/edits. But I did have a few quick questions about press leading to and day of the event:

- We are more than happy to send out the press release and pitch to our contacts. However, we rarely have NY specific releases so that's not really our world. Are there any press lists/contacts you all have and would like to share to ensure full coverage of the event in NY media?
- For clarification, both offices will be sending out the press release, correct?
- Will there be an official photographer on site? If so will he/she be roaming or will they just be taking official pictures? Important for us to know.

Thanks everyone! Looking forward to a great event!

Vanessa

The rampant inequality that we face in America is no accident. It is the result of a system that, for too long, has rewarded existing wealth over work.

There is no more striking example of this phenomenon than the disparity between the earnings - and the tax rates - of kindergarten teachers and hedge fund managers.

In 2014, the top 25 hedge fund managers made more money than every single Kindergarten teacher in America -- combined. That's right: 25 individuals - not even enough to fill the seating space on a single New York City subway car - made more than everyone who teaches our youngest learners put together.

What's more, because of something called carried interest - a tax loophole that exists only to protect the profits of hedge fund managers - those 25 people paid a lower tax rate than many middle-class workers - including Kindergarten teachers -- who earn a wage from working.

If we're to truly tackle the crisis of income inequality, changing that rule - and investing that money in growing our middle class - is where we must start.

Closing the carried interest loophole is a tenant of The Progressive Agenda (URL HERE) to Combat Income Inequality, a 14-point plan introduced by a diverse coalition of progressive leaders in May.

Award-winning filmmaker Robert Greenwald, an inaugural signer of The Progressive Agenda worked with his colleagues at Brave New Films to produce a powerful short film documenting the deeply unfair income and tax law disparities between hedge fund managers and teachers. It is aptly titled "Hedge Fund Billionaires vs. Kindergarten Teachers: Whose Side Are You On?"

The film explores this issue from many different angles. It features interviews with both respected economists and Kindergarten teachers. The film identifies both the macroeconomic problems that the huge gap in wages cause, as well as the human toll paid by teachers and their students. Most important, it proposes a real, concrete solution to the problem: closing the carried interest loophole.

Billionaire hedge fund managers don't need a tax break, and there is no reason this loophole should exist.

Robert and I will be hosting a screening of his film at Pace University in New York City on Thursday, September 10th at 4:30 PM. The film will also be live-streamed here on The Huffington Post (STREAMING INFO HERE).

Following the screening, Robert and I will join a panel including TK, TK and moderated by TK to reflect on the film, what it means for New York City and the

The rampant inequality that we face in America is no accident. It is the result of a system that, for too long, has rewarded existing wealth over work.

There is no more striking example of this phenomenon than the disparity between the earnings - and the tax rates - of kindergarten teachers and hedge fund managers.

In 2014, the top 25 hedge fund managers made more money than every single Kindergarten teacher in America -- combined. That's right: 25 individuals - not even enough to fill the seating space on a single New York City subway car - made more than everyone who teaches our youngest learners put together.

What's more, because of something called carried interest - a tax loophole that exists only to boost the earnings of hedge fund managers - those 25 people paid a lower tax rate than the average Kindergarten teacher.

If we're to truly tackle the crisis of income inequality, changing that rule - and investing that money in growing our middle class - is where we must start.

Here in New York City, we're using every tool at our disposal to help combat income inequality - expanding paid sick leave to 500,000 additional workers, implementing the first rent freeze in city history, building and preserving 200,000 units of affordable housing, expanding after-school programs, and - as of this week - providing high-quality, universal Pre-Kindergarten to every family.

But we need Washington to do its part, too. Making the federal tax code more progressive will allow us to invest in people who are struggling.

To that end, closing the carried interest loophole is a tenant of The Progressive Agenda (URL HERE) to Combat Income Inequality, a 14-point plan introduced by a diverse coalition of progressive leaders in May.

Award-winning filmmaker Robert Greenwald, an inaugural signer of The Progressive Agenda worked with his colleagues at Brave New Films to produce a powerful short film documenting the deeply unfair income and tax law disparities between hedge fund managers and teachers. Two great opportunities to help TPA get back up and running leading into the forum. Both would help further the local work you're doing on income inequality and give us something to push out nationally.

We're in the process of putting together the September and October message calendar (including the forum). I would like sign off to move forward giving them times. TPA would handle both directly:

1. Chris Hayes still would like to interview with MBDB. He would like to do an extended interview with him. 30-45 minutes. It could be in studio or a walk and talk. The main subject: income inequality and his tenure. Timeline: MID SEPTEMBER.

From Chris:

"The Mayor and I should an extended interview"... "yes, but also: EVERYTHING. Like, I'm a better, fairer, better read interlocutor on his entire tenure so far than a lot of the idiocy I'm seeing, and say this as someone who (like everyone) has more than my fair share of criticisms of the Mayor."

2. Sirius interview with Ari Havt Rabin Sirius- the letter below is the invite and the topic: TPA, specifically income inequality. He could highlight his bona fides and work in the city. TIMELINE: OCTOBER

SiriusXM Progress would like to host a special event featuring Mayor Bill De Blasio to highlight his work promoting the progressive agenda. This exclusive event would take place in the Fall at the SiriusXM's studios in New York City. The town hall-style event would feature Mayor De Blasio taking questions from host Ari Rabin-Havt and an intimate studio audience comprised of New York City SiriusXM subscribers.

SiriusXM's event with Mayor Bill De Blasio is part of SiriusXM's ongoing effort to have iconic figures and entertainers sitting down with studio audiences comprised of SiriusXM listeners. Previous SiriusXM specials have featured Vice President Al Gore, Senator Kristen Gillibrand, Cardinal Timothy Dolan, Senator Tom Harkin, Senator Olympia Snowe, Bruce Springsteen, Bud Selig, Harry Belafonte, Taylor Swift and many others.

After the broadcast on SiriusXM, the discussion with Mayor De Blasio will be available on SiriusXM On Demand for subscribers listening via the SiriusXM Internet Radio App for smartphones and other mobile devices or online at siriusxm.com.

SiriusXM is the world's largest radio broadcaster measured by revenue and has more than 27 million subscribers. SiriusXM creates and broadcasts commercial-free music; premier sports talk and live events; comedy; news; exclusive talk and entertainment; and the most comprehensive Latin music, sports and talk programming in radio.

Yes. RKK handling for Team TPA.

It's all good and set for the 14th. No problems.

Only issue is that - as you guys might guess - Hayes is a little miffed that MJ is getting him before Hayes does (when Hayes is totally on the same page as us, and Joe is not a fan of MBDB.)

Not a big deal - we can work through it. And obviously it's made tougher by the fact that RKK can't communicate directly with you guys, for reasons I still find baffling. But all is well. Just needed a little something for Team TPA to save face with Hayes so that he doesn't lose his faith in us.

It's 14 points!

Sorry, copying from my phone, but pasted below:

1 Lift the Floor for Working People »

- Raise the federal minimum wage, so that it reaches $15/hour, while indexing it to inflation.
- Reform the National Labor Relations Act, to enhance workers' right to organize and rebuild the middle class.
- Pass comprehensive immigration reform to grow the economy and protect against exploitation of low-wage workers.
- Oppose trade deals that hand more power to corporations at the expense of American jobs, workers' rights, and the environment.
- Invest in schools, not jails-- and give a second chance to those coming home from prison.

2 Support Working Families »

- Pass national paid sick leave.
- Pass national paid family leave.
- Make Pre-K, after-school programs and childcare universal.
- Expand the Earned Income Tax Credit and protect and expand Social Security.
- Allow students to refinance student loan debt to take advantage of lower interest rates, and support debt-free college.

3 Tax Fairness »

- Close the carried interest loophole.
- End tax breaks for companies that ship jobs overseas.
- Implement the "Buffett Rule" so millionaires pay their fair share.
- Close the CEO tax loophole that allows corporations to take advantage of "performance pay" write-offs.

The rampant inequality that we face in America is no accident. It is the result of a system that, for too long, has rewarded existing wealth over work.

There is no more striking example of this phenomenon than the disparity between the earnings - and the tax rates - of kindergarten teachers and hedge fund managers.

In 2014, the top 25 hedge fund managers made more money than every single Kindergarten teacher in America -- combined. That's right: 25 individuals - not even enough to fill the seating space on a single New York City subway car - made more than everyone who teaches our youngest learners put together.

What's more, because of something called carried interest - a tax loophole that exists only to boost the earnings of hedge fund managers - those 25 people paid a lower tax rate than the average Kindergarten teacher.

If we're to truly tackle the crisis of income inequality, changing that rule - and investing that money in growing our middle class - is where we must start.

Here in New York City, we're using every tool at our disposal to help combat income inequality - expanding paid sick leave to 500,000 additional workers, implementing the first rent freeze in city history, building and preserving 200,000 units of affordable housing, expanding after-school programs, and - as of this week - providing high-quality, universal Pre-Kindergarten to every family.

But we need Washington to do its part, too. Making the federal tax code more progressive will allow us to invest in people who are struggling.

To that end, closing the carried interest loophole is a tenant of The Progressive Agenda (URL HERE) to Combat Income Inequality, a 14-point plan introduced by a diverse coalition of progressive leaders in May.

Award-winning filmmaker Robert Greenwald, an inaugural signer of The Progressive Agenda worked with his colleagues at Brave New Films to produce a powerful short film documenting the deeply unfair income and tax law disparities between hedge fund managers and teachers. It is aptly titled "Hedge Fund Billionaires vs. Kindergarten Teachers: Whose Side Are You On?"

The film explores this issue from many different angles. It features interviews with both respected economists and Kindergarten teachers. The film identifies both the macroeconomic problems that the huge gap in wages cause, as well as the human toll paid by teachers and their students. Most important, it proposes a real, concrete solution to the problem: closing the carried interest loophole.

Billionaire hedge fund managers don't need a tax break, and there is no reason this loophole should exist.

Robert and I will be hosting a screening of his film at Pace University in New York City on Thursday, September 10th at 4:30 PM. The film will also be live-streamed here on The Huffington Post (STREAMING INFO HERE).

Following the screening, Robert and I will join a panel including TK, TK and moderated by TK to reflect on the film, what it means for New York City and the country, and how we can work together to end this injustice once and for all. Subject: Week of 8/31/15- TPA Update
Date: Friday, September 04, 2015 11:35:28 PM

Following the mini retreat with you, we had a staff retreat a week ago to brainstorm ideas and starting putting a full plan around the message output and mayoral strategies. The follow up notes and take aways are available if you would like to see them.

Below are different elements of the campaign and key highlights.

Message:

We capitalized on Trumps comments online as well as echoed stories on wage inequality, taxes, CEO pay where multiple studies/fact shorts were put out by our partners.

We are planning for a Carried Interest Loophole theme week next week tied back to Congress' return on Tuesday, back to school on Wednesday and the roll out of the Greenwald film on Thursday that highlights the tie to education. This will all be pushed out via Twitter, email and traditional earned media.

We are also test driving our outreach to partners by asking them the echo all these messages on their Twitter handle and to their lists.

In addition we are working on larger message framework that marries the highest testing message with your brand of advocacy and fiery message around inequality. We will be using this to fine tune how we talk about each of the 15 points and develop materials to arm our partners with and frame all of our own messages on Twitter, Facebook, in the press. It will also be done in conjunction with lifting our surrogates program.

Our team will be developing a message calendar that focuses on theme weeks as much as possible with current events (congress back, jobs numbers) key organizational and campaign dates (Federal reserve campaign of our partners, report releases from Roosevelt) and our own events (petition drives, forum, endorsement role outs etc). This is in tandem with getting news in as many stories as possible around income inequality and TPAs mission with its partners inserted into them.

Forum

We had our first logistics call to time out and assign work to reach out and invite candidates. In the meantime we do not have a hard confirmation from either the Des Moines Register or CNN. We plan on going back to Simpson and them this week to push for movement. In addition we are going to loop in both members of congress staff to start planning format, extending invites and build. All of this will happen simultaneously to finding a media outlet. Simpson reached out to DMR our next plan will be KCCI this week if we do not hear.

I would like to set up an update call with you a week from this coming Monday on where we are with the forum.

The third track is also planning the programmatic build up working backwards from the day after the forum until now. This will include digital, earned media and a political/organizing strategy with our supporters.

While we are not cemented on a media outlet, the planning is still ramping up so we are ready to plug and play when we do get one.

Political/supporters

In addition to reach out to them next week, we are going to re-engage our signers/supporters by setting up a call towards the end of September with you and a few key other leaders (I would like to talk about this in line with the cochair/leadership strategy we discussed at the mini retreat). There we will unveil the new organization, staff, how we plan on working with each other and discussing our plans (w forum kickoff asks) over the first phase of the organization plan.

We are also setting up a maintenance plan to constantly feed our supporters with information and allow them to easily share with us. This will include written/online updates and organizing calls to both organize on message and program plans.

Hayley has done a great job on taking lead on this work and I would like to talk to you about an official title and job for her to role out along with me.

As the leadership structure shakes out I believe we should bring them in immediately for a group meeting in NYC. For further discussion.

New Organizing

John has connected me with interested groups and I have reached out to current and potential high level leadership at organizations. Now with our plan sign off I am setting meetings to see how we can formally work together. I have also asked Hayley to come to DC to attend a group of these meetings with me. There are some high level leaders and groups I believe you will need to meet with personally with me. I hope to take advantage during a potential DC trip or see if we can schedule a New York trip for some groups.

This is the true organizing work that as you know takes real relationship building and finding common ground and give and take on how we do work together. I want to prioritize the key groups for us to sign on immediately (we have that) in my meetings over the next few weeks.

I sent a separate meeting about Steyer and believe we should discuss ASAP.

Communications/press

We have significant lists of press opportunities and are hoping to get time to schedule them. Coming up is the Hayes interview with you at City Hall. John will be point on briefing you as I will not be in during the scheduled briefing day.

We are also scheduling a Sirius town hall with a reporter where the 45 mins will be dedicated to our issues.

There is much to do here and time in the day is our only enemy.

As far as the rest of the programs, digital and press are echoing message daily.

Digital/online

We are building out our website to be more dynamic with the latest news and activity our partners are taking on in this space. One of the most important builds we have are content pages that will allow easy access to materials for our partners and potential partners. We also will highlight great work of our partners and allow for sharing of information with links back to their pages.

We are also beginning our list acquisition/growth campaign to continue to sign on grassroots/online activists through a variety of ways. Our hope is to then push them to take action offline as well as broadcast the message TPA is pushing out on a weekly basis. You will start to see list growth numbers after our acquisition campaign starts.

These are all a few but not the extent of highlights we have at TPA. I also have some needs that I would like to discuss:

- Steyer partnership
- Scheduling of specific program needs

- follow up on plan and budget

I will see if I can schedule time with you early in the week in addition to our weekly update meeting.

Thank you and hope you have a good weekend.

Unionization Important to Closing Racial Wage Gap, Study Says

A study released on Friday, noting the gains made by black union workers in New York City, said that raising the rate of unionization among black workers across the country would help narrow the racial pay gap.

The study, conducted by two professors affiliated with the Murphy Institute for Worker Education and Labor Studies at the City University of New York, which issued the report, described high unionization rates for black workers who live in the city compared with national rates.

Nearly 40 percent of black workers who are city residents are union members, compared with roughly 13 percent of black workers nationally.

The difference between the rates of black and nonblack unionization is also especially pronounced in New York City. The black unionization rate is nearly double that of nonblacks in the city, a difference that is much smaller nationally.

The authors, Ruth Milkman and Stephanie Luce, found that black union members enjoyed higher wages than black nonunion workers, and were also likely to have better access to employer-sponsored health care benefits and pensions.

“Unionism offers black workers a substantial economic advantage in regard to earnings — to a greater degree than is the case for nonblacks, reflecting the fact that larger numbers of blacks than nonblacks are employed in low-wage jobs,” the study said.

Unionization shrunk the racial wage gap by roughly half, reflecting the tendency of unions to fight for more equal wage distribution across the workplace. Black nonunion workers who live in the city made about $4 less in median hourly earnings than their nonblack counterparts. Among union members, that difference dropped to $2.

Dr. Milkman, a sociology professor, said in an interview that the findings suggested one path to addressing racial disparities in pay and broader income inequality that have come under increasing scrutiny across the country.

“When unions were more powerful in the United States, income inequality was also smaller,” she said. “One component of that is de-unionization.”

She added, referring to the black unionization rate in New York City, “We knew it was better here, but the extent of that is surprising to even us.”

Dr. Milkman said the findings could be explained in part by the fact that the health care and transit industries, which are major parts of the city’s work force and have high proportions of black workers, are heavily unionized.

The study also found that the share of working city residents who identified themselves as union members continued to rebound, after concern swelled several years ago about the steady erosion of union influence in the city. One in four workers residing in the city were union members over an 18-month period from last year to this year, up from roughly one in five in 2012.

Subject: To discuss - our own NYC version - am beginning convos with allies - would not be a c4 and we would have to be purposeful in the groupings and probably break up a bit

'Common Purpose'

By BEN SMITH 04/08/09, 11:29 AM EDT

The latest in a series of new, low-profile efforts to coordinate the unusually focused progressive coalition backing the White House's goals is a quiet weekly meeting run by a new group called the Common Purpose Project.

The Common Purpose meeting every Tuesday afternoon at the Capitol Hilton brings together the top officials from a range of left-leaning organizations, from labor groups like Change to Win to activists like MoveOn.org, all in support of the White House's agenda. The group has an overlapping membership with a daily 8:45 a.m. call run by the Center for American Progress' and Media Matters' political arms; with the new field-oriented coalition Unity '09; and with the groups that allied to back the budget as the Campaign to Rebuild and Renew America Now.

Unlike those other groups, however, the Common Purpose meeting has involved a White House official, communications director Ellen Moran, two sources familiar with the meeting said. It's aimed, said one, at "providing a way for the White House to manage its relationships with some of these independent groups."

The group's founder, political consultant and former Gephardt aide Erik Smith, described it in general terms after others had confirmed its existence.

"The goal is to convene a group of people that identify the most effective progressive messages and to advance a progressive policy agenda," said Smith.

"One of the reasons you're seeing as little party infighting as you've seen in the past is that people are talking with each other more," he said.

Common Purpose is formed as a 501(c)(4), which leaves it focused on policy, rather than electoral, work. Its political director is another former Obama aide, Miti Sathe.

Part of the group's role is to enforce a kind of message discipline, and one topic of discussion there, sources said, was a campaign launched last month by some of the more liberal members of the coalition -- the Campaign for America's Future, USAction, and liberal blogger Jane Hamsher -- under the rubric "Dog the Blue Dogs."

The White House, however, was in the midst of discussions with members of the congressional Blue Dog caucus, and objected to the slogan, which was promptly changed, and the page describing the drive is gone from CAF's website.

Robert Borosage, the president of the Institute for America's Future, which launched the campaign, said he wasn't present at the meeting where the campaign was discussed but that he'd been made aware of the objections.

The weekly Common Purpose meeting shares some aspects with Grover Norquist's long-running Wednesday Meeting of conservative activists, but is more focused on messaging day-to-day politics and doesn't include journalists and academics, people involved said.

UPDATE: Jane Hamsher writes that she wasn't formally a member of the campaign, and also says the White House rebuke wasn't directly linked to the meeting.

To be clear, this seems like an outsiders view that features the thinking of allies and opposition he has talked with. Not sure who those folks are.

If we want a quote or to weigh in with an official voice, and I don't think we necessarily need to on this one, think it should come from Phil to reflect larger strategic thinking.

Talked to Matt and this is less about going around media and more about the Mayor as a constituent services kind of guy.

Bloomberg said everyone was wrong but him, Rudy was hated and didn't care, Ed battled with people in the street, but the Mayor seems more prone to course correct based on public/media critiques than previous Mayor's.

Few examples he is working with: adjusted scheduling and is regularly on time now, Times Square response with the DN, and calls to see more interaction with voters resulted in lots more Lehrer and experiment with things like twitter chat.

From what I can tell this will read: Allies say he has a bias towards good ideas no matter the source and opposition says he is reactive to pressure.

New media/adjustments to media strategy portion seems to enter when comparing Peter Ragone's prior statements that he didn't read the tabloids or care about them, to some of the things we have been doing lately. Matt weighs Peter's statements against our use of Twitter to mock the Post front-page.

Sounds like a relatively neutral story with the biggest danger being that saber-rattling (uber) has shaken the administration at times.

I haven't said anything really.

He talked to me and said he sees the Mayor adjust strategy more than one might have seen from other Mayors. If Bloomberg was late a lot, he probably would have kept doing it. His take generally seemed to be "this Mayor seems willing to take good ideas even if they come from externally." Complaints about him being on time, so he adjusted. Daily News makes a recommendation about calling Times Square parkland to avoid panhandling and the Mayor said it was an idea worth looking at.

Also sees a change in approach on engagement with public. More radio and more public activity like lehrer and ball games.

Will think about whether there's more that might be useful, but I think this should cover it for now.

On Sep 7, 2015, at 2:53 PM, Martinez, Julien <JAMartinez@cityhall.nyc.gov> wrote:

Fog hovered over Jamaica Bay that morning, November 12, as dozens of grieving families gathered for the memorial service in Rockaway Park, along the water in a far precinct of Queens. They had come to mark the 13th anniversary of the crash of American Airlines Flight 587, a flight headed to the Dominican Republic that instead ended up in flames in Far Rockaway, killing 260 people on board, as well as 5 on the ground. Mayor Bill de Blasio was scheduled to arrive at 9:05, 11 minutes before a uniformed officer was to ring a silver bell noting the exact time of the crash. But at 9:05 there was no sign of the mayor, who was on a police launch en route. For several minutes family members stared in disbelief, some shaking their heads; the previous mayor, Michael Bloomberg, had always come early and taken his time speaking with them. When 9:16 came with still no sign of the mayor, the police officer with the bell stood motionless, unsure what to do. Finally one of the mourners, Miriam Estrella, stepped to the podium. "I'm sorry, everyone," she said. "Sorry our mayor's not here." The officer rang the bell. Nine minutes later de Blasio arrived, strode to the podium, and made a speech that did little to calm the furious families. The mayor's staff blamed the fog. But confronted by reporters later that day, de Blasio admitted he simply hadn't gotten out of bed in time. "I had a very rough night, woke up sluggish, and I should have gotten myself moving quicker," he explained. "I just woke up in the middle of the night, couldn't get back to sleep, and felt really sluggish and off-kilter this morning." It wasn't the first—or the last—time de Blasio was late for an official function.

In December he showed up two hours late to a murdered police officer's wake, arriving as it ended. During Saint Patrick's Day festivities he achieved the trifecta of being late for three events in a row: a celebratory breakfast and reception at Gracie Mansion—"his own house," The New York Times noted in italics; a Mass at St. Patrick's Cathedral, which Cardinal Timothy Dolan started without him ("Mayor de Blasio, we're happy you're here," Dolan said when the mayor finally arrived); and a parade in the Rockaways, which the mayor missed half of. The crowd booed when he arrived. A few chanted, "Worst mayor ever." "I'm not hired by the people to go to parades," de Blasio said grumpily afterward. Chronic tardiness is just one of the complaints New Yorkers have voiced about their mayor of not quite 21 months. On the Upper West Side the gripes are about potholes; on the Upper East Side, uncollected garbage; in Greenwich Village the talk is of abandoned storefronts occupied by the homeless. After 20 years of plunging crime rates, crime is again part of the New York conversation. After de Blasio criticized "stop-and-frisk"—detaining and searching people without probable cause—the N Y P D rose in open revolt against him last winter when two officers were murdered. At the funerals the policemen turned their backs on the mayor en masse.

Bill de Blasio is unlike any New York mayor in recent memory, a staunch progressive, a crusader against income inequality and for affordable housing, a man who has as little use for Park Avenue elites as they do for him. In terms of the national political scene, that makes him a far more significant figure on the left than any New York mayor in years. In fact, if you believe that the popularity of politicians such as Massachusetts senator Elizabeth Warren and Vermont senator Bernie Sanders represents a new "progressive moment" in American politics, it's de Blasio who is the one who bears watching. He is the only progressive governing anything of note, and while mayor of New York has historically been a dead-end job for those seeking higher office, it's clear his ambitions aren't confined to the city limits. How far left is de Blasio? This is a man who cut his teeth during the 1980s raising money and distributing food for Nicaragua's Communist Sandinista government, who later married an AfricanAmerican woman who once identified as a radical lesbian, and who honeymooned in Cuba.

A speaker at his inauguration memorably called New York a "plantation," referring to inequality in the city. This kind of talk scares a lot of New Yorkers, especially those who had warmed to the safer, sparkling city that emerged after 12 years of Mayor Michael Bloomberg, a Wall Street-trained management professional, who disdained partisan politics. Asked whom de Blasio can be compared to, one of his three deputy mayors, Alicia Glen, 48, says, "I don't know. No doubt there is some hippie mayor somewhere who is focused on these issues. Maybe Jerry Brown when he was mayor of Oakland." What appears to incense many New Yorkers I spoke with is not only de Blasio's personal style but also a sense that he, unlike Bloomberg, cares far more about politics and his pet projects than actually managing the city. "Most whites I know are left of center, and virtually every one of them can't stand the guy—and these are all Obama-walks-on-water types," says a journalist who has covered the city for 40 years. "This sanctimonious arrogance [he has] just irritates people. But it's more than that. There's no sense this man has any interest, unlike Bloomberg, in the nuts and bolts of how the city works. He's lazy. He shows up late. He insults people by keeping them waiting, and he shrugs it off—'Oh, it's not important. I'm here on time; it matters what happens when I show up.' But it does matter. Part of me wonders if he really wants to be mayor. I wonder if the whole idea bores him, if all he really cares about is being a national figure on progressive issues." "I don't know whether he's lazy," says Mitchell Moss, a onetime Bloomberg adviser who now teaches urban policy and planning at NYU. Wagner "I do know he's the first mayor in recent history to call in sick. O.K.? He doesn't have any of that natural comfort with the details of People want him to reflect the tone of the city, but his agenda is one agenda and nothing else: income inequality and affordable housing. He doesn't care about parks or potholes or anything else. He has two issues [income inequality and affordable housing] and two issues only." "I think people feel that it's not a mayor's prime responsibility to try to lower income inequality," says Heather Mac Donald, of the conservative Manhattan Institute. "Managing New York is enough. If you can keep the streets fixed and maintain discipline in the schools, that is a challenge enough. If you can prove you have the management mettle to do that, then maybe you take on income inequality. To declare [that issue] as your primary mission as mayor strikes people as grandiose. There is a certain messianic quality that he actually thinks he can solve income inequality. I would argue that that is at the very least a premature goal, but most likely a preposterous one. To the extent that income inequality can be addressed by public policy, which is a real question, it certainly can't be done at a local level."

In late July, I followed the mayor through a working day and sat with him for two lengthy discussions, one off the record, over bottles of Brooklyn Lager on the porch at Gracie Mansion (the Colonial mansion that is the official residence of New York mayors), the second, on the record, at his City Hall office. When I asked him if he's aware of the perception that he has little interest in the details of city management, de Blasio's eyes flashed. "Sure," he said. "And it's wrong. But I hear it all the time." He pursed his lips. "It wouldn't be hard to research the truth," he added, "and a lot of people don't bother. I came in saying I was going to change things and acted on it, and I think there are some people who don't like the changes, so they fill in the blanks any way they want. It's inconvenient to their critique of me if I'm handling the budget well, or handling labor relations well, or making the trains run on time. So it doesn't shock me." "I do believe [the elites] all think we're raving Communists," says Alicia Glen, who joined de Blasio's team in 2013, after working at Goldman Sachs. "That's an easy, cocktail-party throwaway line. People are lazy. People love the familiar. Most of the people in [City Hall now] are not familiar to [our critics]. In the past 12 years they've been hanging out at [East Hampton's posh private golf course] the Maidstone Club with [Bloomberg's people] and it's been really nice and easy... But at the end of the day... paid child care, building rental housing, creating a ferry system—these are things any smart person running a city would be doing. The fact that these people don't go to the same golf club as Bill de Blasio? O.K., whatever. That's all this is about." De Blasio's people are quick to point out the initiatives he has introduced that are having a tangible impact on the lives of thousands of poor people and undocumented immigrant New Yorkers, whom they feel Bloomberg ignored. The mayor's centerpiece achievement has brought free pre-kindergarten education to every New York family and free after-school programs for most—a boon for working parents. He has also introduced mandatory paid sick leave and an ambitious program for city identification cards for undocumented residents, allowing them access to city services and facilities.

Such achievements have earned de Blasio praise from unexpected quarters. "I understand why people are concerned, because some of what he says is a little scary," says Hamilton James, president of Blackstone, the big Wall Street investment firm. "But can they object to universal pre-K? Of course not [His deals with] the unions? He's actually cut deals that are better than most of us thought he could get. He's gotten an awful lot done in a short time." "A lot of people, white people, really want to hate this guy," says a veteran City Hall reporter who knows the mayor well. "You know, helping all these poor people? It's not pretty politics. No one wants to watch this get done. But it's what he promised. And it's what he's doing." Nevertheless, many New Yorkers—and not just the Manhattan elites—appear unconvinced, and de Blasio's poll numbers reflect it. A Quinnipiac University Poll in early August found that only 33 percent of New York City voters rated life in the city "very good" or "good"—the lowest number ever measured by the university, and 47 percent believed de Blasio does not deserve re-election. His critics would have you believe de Blasio is New York's most reviled mayor ever. Does he deserve it?

I first catch up with the mayor happily on schedule as he lopes through the bowels of the American Museum of Natural History on his way into the subway. On the platform, flanked by his security detail, he greets a pair of uniformed cops as the B train roars into the station. At first, no one inside the halfempty car recognizes the familiar figure in their midst. "There's two types of rides," de Blasio tells me, grasping a center pole. "One, when no one notices me. Two, when the whole car presses forward and everyone wants selfies. It's a little surreal. Sometimes I miss my old life." Sitting to one side, a middle-aged African-American woman makes eye contact. "You're a handsome guy!" she exclaims. De Blasio steps over for a hug. As if on cue, a pair of city workers step up for handshakes and selfies. De Blasio smiles and accommodates. We talk about his past role models in the job. "La Guardia was a big part of it," he says, mentioning Fiorello La Guardia, the popular mayor of New York in the 1930s and 40s. "He was the first true progressive mayor and was beloved in a way none of us will ever achieve. New York is a very emotional place, a lot of big emotions, and everyone is pressed together so tightly. And La Guardia brought this real sense of caring, of a personal give-and-take with every New Yorker. After that, people had this new vision of the mayor." At West Fourth Street, de Blasio strides up a flight of stairs and boards the A train, which takes him toward City Hall. This time he is noticed and consents to a dozen more selfies. "How you doing, brother?" he asks one young African-American man who hangs back. The man beams. Of the 25 or so people who approach during our ride, at least three-quarters are black, perhaps unsurprisingly, since de Blasio has a black wife and his Yale-bound son has an enormous Afro. "And then Ed Koch," de Blasio continues, "he borrowed the template from La Guardia, a real expectation of how the mayor has to be." I remark that, political philosophies aside, de Blasio's style bears little resemblance to that of La Guardia (a publicity-hungry dynamo obsessed with infrastructure) or Koch (a publicity-hungry lovable obnoxious-uncle type). De Blasio, by comparison, can come off as a wallflower. There is no sense of alpha male about him. "There is a heavy-ego, solitary model of being an elected leader," he tells me. "We've certainly seen that in some other mayors of this city. I have much more of a Movement mentality. It's much more of what I'm steeped in. I don't think it is first and foremost about me. It's about the ideas and the agenda... What I think it is about me is I'm not afraid to try these new things."

In person, the first thing you notice is de Blasio's height; he is six feet five inches and looks taller. Like some tall people, he can seem awkward in public situations. He is not a natural orator, nor does he possess either charisma or gravitas. At the American Museum of Natural History, where he oversees a press conference, he relies on an uneasy smile, chuckles, and lame wisecracks. Asking for questions and getting no more, he says, "Going once... going twice." His style is that of a nervous suburban dad trying to be cool in front of his teenager's pals, an updated version of Clark Griswold from National Lampoon's Vacation. He is much better in small groups, holding eye contact, smiling easily, and speaking in complete sentences. "I think the most amazing thing is, when I introduce him to people, I'd say almost 90 percent of the time I get a phone call or an e-mail the next day saying, 'Wow, I can't believe how smart he is,'" says Glen. "No, it's true. I think there's some weird perception out there that he's not very smart." De Blasio is by nature and training a coalition builder, who easily draws input from everyone in a room, even skeptics. At a meeting with African-American executives seeking greater access to city contracts, he makes sure every last attendee, all 25 of them, gets a chance to speak. It's an approach that offsets the stridency of some of his campaign rhetoric. "I had been a little bit skeptical about his reaching out to the business community, because obviously, from the get-go, there was a bit of a schism," says Jerry Speyer, a founding partner of the real-estate colossus Tishman Speyer, whose holdings include such New York properties as Rockefeller Center and the Chrysler Building. "But I can tell you, and I've known every mayor since John Lindsay, I've been extremely impressed. The one thing I appreciate is he really solicits candor and open discussion. He is enormously respectful. We don't agree on a lot of things, but from the first time we spoke, I came away and felt, Gee, I can talk to this man." By the time the meeting with African-American executives is over he is running 45 minutes behind schedule. Referring to his chronic tardiness, de Blasio admits, "People in that meeting had valid complaints I could have said, 'O.K., only five people get to speak, and we're out of here.' Presidential-style I do feel it's my obligation to listen, sometimes to a fault. I don't want to have a meeting and leave the room without resolution. I understand why it's something I have to do better on." I ask de Blasio how he sleeps. "Physiologically, my perfect day would be to stay up until two and get up at nine. I've had to adapt. Now I get up at six. I do think [my] body is adjusting to that. Too many days I'm up at three or four and I can't get back to sleep." A different de Blasio emerges when he is tired, as at a late-afternoon meeting with staff implementing the pre-K program. In the middle of City Hall's cavernous Blue Room, beneath the gaze of an immense portrait of founding father Alexander Hamilton, the mayor sits alone on one side of a hollowed rectangle of adjoining tables, tie removed, sleeves rolled above the elbow; the others sit across from him, servile and subordinate. He has heard this all many times; he swallows at least three yawns. He sprawls, his arms enveloping adjacent chairs, then grows fidgety, his hands roaming his face, rubbing his neck and forehead, fingers picking at some unseen blemish. He talks with his hands, with a lot of pointed index fingers. With staff he has no problem brandishing authority. "All right, what else?" he says several times.

De Blasio's management style is a work in progress—the City of New York, after all, is the first organization of any size he has ever managed, an observation that draws scoffs from his advisers. "Name me five mayors who ran anything at all before they ran a city," snaps Glen. "Name five that ran anything bigger than a hair salon. What did [former Obama White House chief of staff and current Chicago mayor] Rahm Emanuel run before he was mayor? What did [former academic and current Los Angeles mayor] Eric Garcetti run? That's crazy." A person who deals regularly with the mayor's office on behalf of an organization he runs compares de Blasio's management style with those of two previous New York mayors. "[Rudy] Giuliani's people were thugs," he says. "Bloomberg was pretty great because even if he didn't care about an initiative personally, if his people liked it, he let them run with it. The problem with de Blasio is that he's a micromanager. Everything has to go up to the top, to him. And his people, though they all seem well meaning, are often not as efficient as they might be or as qualified for their posts as you might wish." Says a longtime political operative who admires the mayor, "I've known Bill a long time, and he is really more like a liberal professor or political activist than he is actually a mayor. If you look at mayors around the country, look at Rahm in Chicago, Garcetti in L.A., they tend to be more nonpartisan than not. They tend to be problem solvers: 'What's the problem? What's the solution?' Bill comes from a very different perspective.

When Bill is presented with a problem, I always imagine him musing, 'Hmm, what's my political philosophy on this?' He's not a natural manager—I mean, that's an understatement. "Every mayor has a troubled transition, but eventually he learns," says a longtime Democratic consultant who worked in the Koch and Dinkins administrations. "I wish I could see some progress toward that. I wish I could see better people around him. There is no steady hand behind the wheel in City Hall. I wish I could see more attention to governance issues. And I don't see it. I'm not alone. It's a common view among people I talk to." Another common criticism is that de Blasio is prone to shooting from the hip, which can inflame situations that with time might be handled more diplomatically. A prominent figure in the New York media world cites the flap during the 2013 mayoral campaign that de Blasio waded into over the horse-drawn carriages in Central Park. The carriages, driven by men and women in top hats, are, for visitors and natives alike, the picture-perfect New York postcard scene, capturing the romance and timelessness of the city. But to the surprise of veteran New York politicians the carriages became a major wedge issue in the race. Citing cruelty to the horses, a coalition of horse-lovers helped unseat the frontrunner for the Democratic nomination Christine Quinn, who did not support the ban. But de Blasio swiftly embraced it, vowing to make the banning of the horses happen during his first week in office if elected. And yet, on fine summer days in New York, if you head to the corner of Fifth Avenue and Central Park South, you will still see the carriages lined up, waiting to take you on a ride through the park. For, despite his vow, which, bizarre as it might seem, is still remembered by New Yorkers, de Blasio never found the votes in the City Council to accomplish what became one of his most famous promises.

It underscores his main leadership problem: that he often does not clearly think through the ramifications of an idea he espouses (horses may be euthanized, carriage drivers will be out of a job) or figure out a strategy to accomplish it. This allows him to be outmaneuvered time and time again, on such issues as banning charter schools from using city buildings or capping the number of Uber cars in the city. "Sometimes he wades into issues that are not all that substantive, which people get agitated about," says Blackstone's James. "The Uber thing jumps to mind. He doesn't have to do that. The horse-drawn carriage is another thing. A totally unnecessary controversy. I would like him to be a little more like a C.E.O., you know, let your team take care of these things, take some time, make some recommendations, and these things would just fade away." For all the complaints, City Hall under de Blasio has been a surprisingly tight ship.

There have been few significant media leaks and little sign of the kind of turf wars and infighting that commonly infest a new administration. "He made clear from the beginning he wanted a 'coherence' in point of view; he wanted people who believed the things we believe," says First Deputy Mayor Anthony Shorris, who handles much of the actual day-to-day city management. "Some people want a 'Team of Rivals.' That's not our thing. It makes it much easier for everyone to get along, much easier for everyone to get their jobs done, and much easier to delegate."

The New New Normal

While de Blasio's agenda may have struck a chord during an election year when the world was buzzing about "the 1 percent," it was the optics of his family that made the difference, many observers believe. The de Blasios feature a German-Italian dad, a black onetime-gay mom, and two offspring, Dante and Chiara, all happily ensconced in their brick-and-clapboard row house in Brooklyn.

Black, white, Italian, L.G.B.T.—the de Blasios are like a sitcom family cast to appeal to every voting block short of Hasidic Jews. It was Dante's famous 30-second TV testimonial to his father's progressive policies, which ended with the surprise reveal that Dante was the white candidate's black son, that, many people believe, won his father the election "That ad killed us," a competitor said afterward Without his family, de Blasio's life story is messier His real name, after all, is not Bill de Blasio He was born Warren Wilhelm Jr in 1961, in New York City, though his parents called him "Bill" from an early age He grew up in Boston; he remains a die-hard Red Sox fan—anathema for New York Yankee fans De Blasio's father, Warren senior, was a onetime business reporter at Time magazine, who was wounded during World War II and clearly suffered post-traumatic stress of some kind He was an alcoholic He and his wife divorced when de Blasio was seven; 10 years later, his father committed suicide, shooting himself outside a Connecticut hotel De Blasio was raised in the bosom of his mother's Italian family and ended up taking their last name as his own, though he didn't change it legally until 2001 He left Boston to attend New York University in 1979 and never went back After graduate school and several years supporting progressive Central American causes, he began climbing the political ladder, volunteering for David Dinkins's mayoral campaign in 1989, working as an aide in the Dinkins administration, then running Representative Charles Rangel's successful congressional campaign in 1994 Then came a job at the Department of Housing and Urban Development, a stint as campaign manager of Hillary Clinton's 2000 senatorial campaign, and finally the first election of his own in 2001, when de Blasio won a seat on the New York City Council He met his wife at City Hall, working for Dinkins "I met him right around the corner there Want to see the spot?" asks Chirlane McCray, who, between a peripatetic career in New York journalism and public relations, was writing speeches for Dinkins at the time New York's first lady comes across as serene and cerebral; de Blasio rarely misses a chance to call her his most important adviser In 2009 de Blasio won election as the city's public advocate, a kind of consumer-affairs commissioner, a position that was well suited to his crusaderism

Four years later, in January 2013, he announced for mayor, one more ho-hum Democrat in a crowded field hoping to succeed Bloomberg For six months no one paid much attention to him But buoyed by his single-minded focus on income inequality and affordable housing, he started to inch up in the polls during the summer of 2013 Then "the Dante commercial" lit a fire beneath his campaign that carried him to victory over Christine Quinn It did not hurt that the Democratic field was badly fractured, or that all one needed to win the primary was to secure 40 percent of the vote, which de Blasio accomplished by securing exactly 40 percent of the vote Though he eventually won the mayoralty with 73 percent of the vote, it was the lowest turnout since 1917 Even today, there are many who feel he is an accidental mayor "The founding myth of the de Blasio administration is that people heard his transcendent vision about income inequality and there was a mandate for that," says the operative and longtime acquaintance of the mayor's, "when in fact there was a win by default He was elected because he was running against three Democrats and a Republican who ran a shitty campaign He has taken this as a mandate for running this city on what he campaigned on Bill thinks he was elected on income inequality, and he wasn't I think he misunderstands the electorate "

The tone of de Blasio's tenure as mayor was set in its opening days, when a January storm inundated the city with nearly a foot of snow The next morning residents of Park Avenue were flabbergasted to find many of the Upper East Side's streets unplowed; many plows, it turned out, had been dispatched to less affluent neighborhoods, in Brooklyn and Queens When not one but two Upper East Side grandes dames tripped on potholes and broke their ankles it became urban legend that de Blasio had declared war on Manhattan's elite

By far the roughest moments of de Blasio's first year involved the police The "Black Lives Matter" movement, which caught fire in Ferguson, Missouri, in 2014, sent crowds of protesters into New York City's streets De Blasio pointedly refused to condemn their accusations of routine police racism, infuriating the head of the Patrolmen's Benevolent Association, Patrick Lynch When a mentally troubled man shot and killed two policemen last December, Lynch memorably told reporters de Blasio had "blood on his hands " Much of the N Y P D went on a kind of work strike and seemed to be refusing to make minor arrests or write tickets; only the hard lobbying of de Blasio's heralded police chief, William Bratton, a veteran commissioner of the Giuliani years, managed to bring matters to an uneasy truce While Lynch and other union officials declined comment for this article, their hatred of de Blasio—there's no other word for it—has clearly not gone away "He is not running the city of New York," Lynch told one group earlier this year, according to Capital New York "He thinks he's running a fucking revolution " Worse was yet to come: also in December, near the height of tensions, de Blasio told a press conference how, as the father of a black teenager, he had several times cautioned Dante to be careful when dealing with the police "We've had to literally train him," he said, "as families have all over this city for decades, in how to take special care in any encounter he has with the police officers who are there to protect him " Lynch responded by saying de Blasio had thrown the N Y P D "under the bus " At his City Hall office, I ask the mayor whether he believes young men of color still have reason to fear the police De Blasio chooses his words carefully "It's not about stereotyping a whole police force or the officers within it," he says "It's about a history we've inherited that rightfully leaves a lot of parents of color—and I am not a person of color, but I have a child who is of color—it leaves you aware of the need that they understand how to make sure they understand some of the challenges I simply said something out loud that hundreds of thousands of people in this city could identify with Why can't we be honest about that and recognize it's something we need to overcome? I think we're in the process of overcoming it I think that conversation's going to be a lot more rare over the next 10 or 20 years from now, but we're not quite there yet "

Talk to many political pundits in New York and they will say, off the record and under their breath, that de Blasio favors the needs of blacks and Latinos over whites, the have-nots over the haves And yet, despite the fact that he carried 96 percent of the black vote, relations between de Blasio and the city's black leaders have steadily deteriorated Part of it was de Blasio's refusal to clean house at the N Y P D ; part of it was that early on he consulted with the Reverend Al Sharpton, who is openly hostile to many of the city's longtime black leaders, some of whom now feel de Blasio is taking them for granted The city's most prominent black leader is the Reverend Calvin Butts, of Harlem's Abyssinian Baptist Church When I talked to him in July and mentioned the mayor, he was breathing fire "De Blasio, in the words of the Stevie Wonder song, 'you ain't done nothing,'" the reverend said barely 30 seconds into our conversation "I can't even get in to see his commissioners I've built thousands of units of affordable housing I think I met with his office of economic development once I've created the first high school in the black community in 50 years, in Harlem, and I can't even meet the [schools] chancellor His administration is disorganized You hear these complaints from other people, not just me I think he feels comfortable in whoever is advising him that the black community is in his pocket It's not If he's really with us, stick with us I need a John Brown [the white abolitionist who advocated armed insurrection] type I feel strange saying this, but 'People in the black community, please, don't be taken for a ride by this man "' The reverend was just getting warmed up He attacked the mayor for failing to put a to- tal end to stop-and-frisk; for hiring Bratton, an architect of "broken windows" policing of minor violations like loitering; and especially for failing to fire the officer whose choke hold led to the death of a black man, Eric Garner, in Staten Island last summer "He's using taxpayer money to support a murderer " Reverend Butts and other clergy met with de Blasio last spring to air these concerns "We put pressure on him as the clergy," Butts told me, "and as the result of that pressure he plays to the media, then he tries the old slave-master trick of divide and conquer [With de Blasio] it's all a trick You have no power, no say His administration is not following through [on its promises], and I think, you know, it's because he's not a tough administrator, a tough C E O "We've seen liberal racists before," Butts concludes "I'm not going to call him a racist just yet I just think that his posture shows great disrespect for the black and brown communities Great disrespect I will not call him the r-word But it's terrible now It's condescending " When I mention Reverend Butts's anger to Glen, she doesn't appear concerned. In fact, she rolls her eyes. "I've known the reverend for 30 years," she says with a sigh. "He's never been a happy camper."

When you get down to it, managing the five boroughs is only half of any New York City mayor's job. The other half is dealing with the state capital, in Albany, where the fate of countless city measures rests in the hands of a hostile Republican-led State Senate and, above all, in those of Democratic governor Andrew Cuomo. The open secret of de Blasio's power is that he doesn't have that much. He manages the city and negotiates contracts with police, firemen, and teachers, but he can work only with the tools that state legislators grant him. The sole tax he controls is the property tax, which no mayor dares raise. "You sit down there as a mayor and you believe you're the captain of the ship," an unnamed state official told the New York Daily News this summer, "but really everything is subject to state law. You want to change the speed limit? You want to put in red light cameras? You need to flush the toilet? You need a state law. And that's jarring." That unnamed official, almost certainly the same one who characterized de Blasio to The Wall Street Journal as "bumbling and incompetent," is believed by some to be none other than the governor himself. And, in fact, Cuomo hasn't denied it when asked—which only begins to get at the central challenge of de Blasio's second year in office: the Andrew Problem. Though they are both Democrats and have long taken pains to play nice in public, Cuomo has undermined the mayor at seemingly every opportunity. De Blasio's frustration finally boiled over in June, when he stunned the New York political world by openly excoriating Cuomo to reporters as a bully bent on "revenge" for de Blasio's daring to disagree with him. Many insiders felt the mayor was committing political suicide. "What we have here is a situation where de Blasio was turning the other cheek constantly," says Alan Chartock, a longtime political pundit in the state capital. "I kept saying, What the hell is going on here? De Blasio helped him a lot in his last election, you know. He saved Andrew's ass. You would think that Andrew would say thank you. On the contrary.

Every time de Blasio turns around, he's been hit on the head by Andrew. Why is de Blasio being so compliant? Everyone says the city is a creature of the state, he has to kiss Andrew's ass. And, of course, it turns out that the more he kissed the more Andrew went into his bully mode. I don't think de Blasio had any choice. He had to do it, or he looked absolutely feckless." De Blasio won't discuss it, but it's not hard to get a sense of his thinking if you hang around City Hall long enough. The two men go back: Cuomo was the Department of Housing and Urban Development (HUD) secretary when de Blasio was working there. Twenty years ago de Blasio viewed Cuomo as the next great hope of the Democrats. Today he sees him as a hostage to Wall Street bankers and hedge-funders. Tensions between the governor and the mayor were rising even before de Blasio took office. His signature initiative, a prekindergarten program, needed a half-billion dollars in funding, and de Blasio was intent on raising income taxes on wealthy New Yorkers to get it. But Cuomo was up for reelection and made it clear he would never raise taxes in an election year. Instead, he came up with the money from state funds. De Blasio, rather than happily accepting the governor's largesse, continued to demand the tax hike for months afterward, until it became clear the Legislature would never pass it. De Blasio, it should be pointed out, made things far tougher on himself when he openly campaigned to unseat many of the very Republican legislators he needed to get this and other measures passed.

Matters came to a head in the spring of 2014 when de Blasio was to lead an Albany demonstration organized by the teachers' union against the spread of charter schools—private schools that receive government funding, which liberals feel weakens the public school system. Instead of joining him, as de Blasio had hoped, Cuomo helped organize a pro-charter demonstration the very same day. According to insiders, de Blasio angrily confronted the governor afterward. He left feeling nothing was settled. For months de Blasio searched for a favor he could do. Cuomo that would require repayment when the Legislature reconvened last January. He found his chance last summer when the governor, whose reelection was expected to be a cakewalk, encountered not only a surprisingly strong Republican opponent, Rob Astorino, but the threat of a thirdparty candidate from the progressive Working Families Party, or WFP, a group de Blasio knew well. De Blasio, in a series of late-night meetings, prevailed on WFP leaders to back Cuomo in return for several promises from the governor, including that he would campaign on behalf of liberal Democrats and raise the state minimum wage. "Bill went way out on a limb for Andrew," says a de Blasio partisan. "It was a very personal appeal. He put a lot of his capital on the line." When Cuomo expressed his gratitude, de Blasio felt he finally had the governor in his camp. But then came last winter's angry confrontations with the NYPD. De Blasio waited for a supportive statement from Cuomo. It never came. When the officers turned their backs on him, de Blasio again waited for Cuomo to say something in support. More silence.

According to the de Blasio partisan, the mayor confronted Cuomo afterward. "The answer Bill got was unsatisfactory," says this person. But, for de Blasio, the final straw came when Cuomo refused to follow through on any of his promises to the WFP. "The mayor was astounded," says one person in his camp. Matters only got worse during the legislative session that began in January. De Blasio badly needed a complicated new tax deal to spur the building of affordable housing; Cuomo tried to block it. De Blasio also wanted an extension of mayoral control over city schools; Cuomo tried to block it. The mayor ultimately won a compromise version of both measures, but it was the Legislature's decision in June to grant him only one year of control over the schools—Bloomberg had been given seven—that drove de Blasio over the edge. "That was the moment for Bill, that was the ultimate offense," says one Democratic power broker. As this article goes to press, relations between de Blasio and Cuomo remain frigid. What that means for New York City going forward, no one knows. But it's clear de Blasio will not deviate from his agenda, of which he remains enormously proud; at one point in our discussions he even compared it to FDR's New Deal. It may not be the New Deal, but de Blasio has racked up more substantive successes than his critics are willing to concede. Besides the pre-K program, the new contracts negotiated with almost every municipal union, and the expanded paid sick leave, he all but stopped the NYPD's controversial stop-and-frisk policy (a tactic Bloomberg had already begun reining in), and unveiled a $41 billion plan to preserve or build 200,000 units of affordable housing over the next decade. "This is not partisan radical stuff," says Alicia Glen. "The fact that this is being sort of couched in 'We're so lefty' is so fascinating because 90 percent of what we're doing is just basic good business principles. Of course you'd have paid sick leave. Of course you'd have better wages. Of course you'd be investing in infrastructure. I don't think it's that we're so radical. I think it's that the rest of the country has gone so crazy. Building rental housing? If that makes you a crazy lefty, I don't know what's going on in the world. That's a sad statement about how far to the right and crazy the country has gotten." Love him or hate him, the smart money in New York City says that de Blasio is virtually ensured a second term. "What Manhattanites in the 'Bloomberg Bubble' don't understand," says the organization head who deals regularly with the mayor's office, "is that many people in the outer boroughs love him as much as Manhattanites hate him. But even more important is that the city's builders love him, and they have always elected the mayor in New York City, by funneling more money than anyone else to their chosen candidate. Why do they love de Blasio? Because he doesn't give a damn about urban planning, density, or architecture. He only cares about more affordable housing. For the builders that means they get to build an extra 20 floors and do it with fewer restrictions." "Being progressive in a municipal sense is investing in the people that make cities great," Glen says. "We try to use cities to raise people up, right? That's the history of cities. Why do people go to Rome instead of staying on their chicken farm in the middle of God knows where? Because cities are where opportunity and innovation happen." Thus a city, she argues, is the perfect place for a crusade like de Blasio's. "It is the petri dish," she concludes, "where people can get shit done." ♦

Although there are a few good moments in this, it is overall horrid. The journalist blatantly lied to us, and he has a horrible grasp of the facts (as our research indicated). This was a ridiculous waste of our time, and we shouldn't fall for this trick again. Only trust those who have proven themselves to us

The Longest Summer

Since his 2014 inauguration, New York mayor Bill de Blasio has alienated the Park Avenue elite, earned the hatred of his Police Department, and clashed with the governor. And despite his progressive agenda, his relationship with the city's black leaders has steadily deteriorated. So why does the smart money say he's almost guaranteed a second term?

VANITY FAIR - Bryan Burrough

[EMBARGOED UNTIL 9:15 PM TONIGHT]

Fog hovered over Jamaica Bay that morning, November 12, as dozens of grieving families gathered for the memorial service in Rockaway Park, along the water in a far precinct of Queens. They had come to mark the 13th anniversary of the crash of American Airlines Flight 587, a flight headed to the Dominican Republic that instead ended up in flames in Far Rockaway, killing 260 people on board, as well as 5 on the ground. Mayor Bill de Blasio was scheduled to arrive at 9:05, 11 minutes before a uniformed officer was to ring a silver bell noting the exact time of the crash. But at 9:05 there was no sign of the mayor, who was on a police launch en route. For several minutes family members stared in disbelief, some shaking their heads; the previous mayor, Michael Bloomberg, had always come early and taken his time speaking with them. When 9:16 came with still no sign of the mayor, the police officer with the bell stood motionless, unsure what to do. Finally one of the mourners, Miriam Estrella, stepped to the podium. "I'm sorry, everyone," she said. "Sorry our mayor's not here." The officer rang the bell. Nine minutes later de Blasio arrived, strode to the podium, and made a speech that did little to calm the furious families. The mayor's staff blamed the fog. But confronted by reporters later that day, de Blasio admitted he simply hadn't gotten out of bed in time. "I had a very rough night, woke up sluggish, and I should have gotten myself moving quicker," he explained. "I just woke up in the middle of the night, couldn't get back to sleep, and felt really sluggish and off-kilter this morning." It wasn't the first—or the last—time de Blasio was late for an official function.

In December he showed up two hours late to a murdered police officer's wake, arriving as it ended. During Saint Patrick's Day festivities he achieved the trifecta of being late for three events in a row: a celebratory breakfast and reception at Gracie Mansion—"his own house," The New York Times noted in italics; a Mass at St. Patrick's Cathedral, which Cardinal Timothy Dolan started without him ("Mayor de Blasio, we're happy you're here," Dolan said when the mayor finally arrived); and a parade in the Rockaways, which the mayor missed half of. The crowd booed when he arrived. A few chanted, "Worst mayor ever." "I'm not hired by the people to go to parades," de Blasio said grumpily afterward. Chronic tardiness is just one of the complaints New Yorkers have voiced about their mayor of not quite 21 months. On the Upper West Side the gripes are about potholes; on the Upper East Side, uncollected garbage; in Greenwich Village the talk is of abandoned storefronts occupied by the homeless. After 20 years of plunging crime rates, crime is again part of the New York conversation. After de Blasio criticized “stop-and-frisk”—detaining and searching people without probable cause—the N.Y.P.D. rose in open revolt against him last winter when two officers were murdered. At the funerals the policemen turned their backs on the mayor en masse.

Bill de Blasio is unlike any New York mayor in recent memory, a staunch progressive, a crusader against income inequality and for affordable housing, a man who has as little use for Park Avenue elites as they do for him. In terms of the national political scene, that makes him a far more significant figure on the left than any New York mayor in years. In fact, if you believe that the popularity of politicians such as Massachusetts senator Elizabeth Warren and Vermont senator Bernie Sanders represents a new “progressive moment” in American politics, it’s de Blasio who is the one who bears watching. He is the only progressive governing anything of note, and while mayor of New York has historically been a dead-end job for those seeking higher office, it’s clear his ambitions aren’t confined to the city limits. How far left is de Blasio? This is a man who cut his teeth during the 1980s raising money and distributing food for Nicaragua’s Communist Sandinista government, who later married an African American woman who once identified as a radical lesbian, and who honeymooned in Cuba.

A speaker at his inauguration memorably called New York a “plantation,” referring to inequality in the city. This kind of talk scares a lot of New Yorkers, especially those who had warmed to the safer, sparkling city that emerged after 12 years of Mayor Michael Bloomberg, a Wall Street-trained management professional, who disdained partisan politics. Asked whom de Blasio can be compared to, one of his three deputy mayors, Alicia Glen, 48, says, “I don’t know. No doubt there is some hippie mayor somewhere who is focused on these issues. Maybe Jerry Brown when he was mayor of Oakland.” What appears to incense many New Yorkers I spoke with is not only de Blasio’s personal style but also a sense that he, unlike Bloomberg, cares far more about politics and his pet projects than actually managing the city. “Most whites I know are left of center, and virtually every one of them can’t stand the guy—and these are all Obama-walks-on-water types,” says a journalist who has covered the city for 40 years. “This sanctimonious arrogance [he has] just irritates people. But it’s more than that. There’s no sense this man has any interest, unlike Bloomberg, in the nuts and bolts of how the city works. He’s lazy. He shows up late. He insults people by keeping them waiting, and he shrugs it off—‘Oh, it’s not important I’m here on time; it matters what happens when I show up.’ But it does matter. Part of me wonders if he really wants to be mayor. I wonder if the whole idea bores him, if all he really cares about is being a national figure on progressive issues.” “I don’t know whether he’s lazy,” says Mitchell Moss, a onetime Bloomberg adviser who now teaches urban policy and planning at NYU Wagner. “I do know he’s the first mayor in recent history to call in sick. O.K.? He doesn’t have any of that natural comfort with the details of government.

People want him to reflect the tone of the city, but his agenda is one agenda and nothing else: income inequality and affordable housing. He doesn’t care about parks or potholes or anything else. He has two issues [income inequality and affordable housing] and two issues only.” “I think people feel that it’s not a mayor’s prime responsibility to try to lower income inequality,” says Heather Mac Donald, of the conservative Manhattan Institute. “Managing New York is enough. If you can keep the streets fixed and maintain discipline in the schools, that is a challenge enough. If you can prove you have the management mettle to do that, then maybe you take on income inequality. To declare [that issue] as your primary mission as mayor strikes people as grandiose. There is a certain messianic quality that he actually thinks he can solve income inequality. I would argue that that is at the very least a premature goal, but most likely a preposterous one. To the extent that income inequality can be addressed by public policy, which is a real question, it certainly can’t be done at a local level.”

In late July, I followed the mayor through a working day and sat with him for two lengthy discussions, one off the record, over bottles of Brooklyn Lager on the porch at Gracie Mansion (the Colonial mansion that is the official residence of New York mayors), the second, on the record, at his City Hall office. When I asked him if he's aware of the perception that he has little interest in the details of city management, de Blasio's eyes flashed. "Sure," he said. "And it's wrong. But I hear it all the time." He pursed his lips. "It wouldn't be hard to research the truth," he added, "and a lot of people don't bother. I came in saying I was going to change things and acted on it, and I think there are some people who don't like the changes, so they fill in the blanks any way they want. It's inconvenient to their critique of me if I'm handling the budget well, or handling labor relations well, or making the trains run on time. So it doesn't shock me." "I do believe [the elites] all think we're raving Communists," says Alicia Glen, who joined de Blasio's team in 2013, after working at Goldman Sachs. "That's an easy, cocktail-party throwaway line. People are lazy. People love the familiar. Most of the people in [City Hall now] are not familiar to [our critics]. In the past 12 years they've been hanging out at [East Hampton's posh private golf course] the Maidstone Club with [Bloomberg's people] and it's been really nice and easy.... But at the end of the day ... paid child care, building rental housing, creating a ferry system—these are things any smart person running a city would be doing. The fact that these people don't go to the same golf club as Bill de Blasio? O.K., whatever. That's all this is about." De Blasio's people are quick to point out the initiatives he has introduced that are having a tangible impact on the lives of thousands of poor people and undocumented immigrant New Yorkers, whom they feel Bloomberg ignored. The mayor's centerpiece achievement has brought free pre-kindergarten education to every New York family and free after-school programs for most—a boon for working parents. He has also introduced mandatory paid sick leave and an ambitious program for city identification cards for undocumented residents, allowing them access to city services and facilities.

Such achievements have earned de Blasio praise from unexpected quarters. "I understand why people are concerned, because some of what he says is a little scary," says Hamilton James, president of Blackstone, the big Wall Street investment firm. "But can they object to universal pre-K? Of course not. [His deals with] the unions? He's actually cut deals that are better than most of us thought he could get. He's gotten an awful lot done in a short time." "A lot of people, white people, really want to hate this guy," says a veteran City Hall reporter who knows the mayor well. "You know, helping all these poor people? It's not pretty politics. No one wants to watch this get done. But it's what he promised. And it's what he's doing." Nevertheless many New Yorkers—and not just the Manhattan elites—appear unconvinced, and de Blasio's poll numbers reflect it. A Quinnipiac University Poll in early August found that only 33 percent of New York City voters rated life in the city "very good" or "good"—the lowest number ever measured by the university, and 47 percent believed de Blasio does not deserve re-election. His critics would have you believe de Blasio is New York's most reviled mayor ever. Does he deserve it?

I first catch up with the mayor happily on schedule as he lopes through the bowels of the American Museum of Natural History on his way into the subway. On the platform, flanked by his security detail, he greets a pair of uniformed cops as the B train roars into the station. At first, no one inside the halfempty car recognizes the familiar figure in their midst. "There's two types of rides," de Blasio tells me, grasping a center pole. "One, when no one notices me. Two, when the whole car presses forward and everyone wants selfies. It's a little surreal. Sometimes I miss my old life." Sitting to one side, a middle-aged African-American woman makes eye contact. "You're a handsome guy!" she exclaims. De Blasio steps over for a hug. As if on cue, a pair of city workers step up for handshakes and selfies. De Blasio smiles and accommodates. We talk about his past role models in the job. “La Guardia was a big part of it,” he says, mentioning Fiorello La Guardia, the popular mayor of New York in the 1930s and 40s. “He was the first true progressive mayor and was beloved in a way none of us will ever achieve. New York is a very emotional place, a lot of big emotions, and everyone is pressed together so tightly. And La Guardia brought this real sense of caring, of a personal give-and-take with every New Yorker. After that, people had this new vision of the mayor.” At West Fourth Street, de Blasio strides up a flight of stairs and boards the A train, which takes him toward City Hall. This time he is noticed and consents to a dozen more selfies. “How you doing, brother?” he asks one young African-American man who hangs back. The man beams. Of the 25 or so people who approach during our ride, at least three-quarters are black, perhaps unsurprisingly, since de Blasio has a black wife and his Yale-bound son has an enormous Afro. “And then Ed Koch,” de Blasio continues, “he borrowed the template from La Guardia, a real expectation of how the mayor has to be.” I remark that, political philosophies aside, de Blasio’s style bears little resemblance to that of La Guardia (a publicity-hungry dynamo obsessed with infrastructure) or Koch (a publicity-hungry lovable obnoxious-uncle type). De Blasio, by comparison, can come off as a wallflower. There is no sense of alpha male about him. “There is a heavy-ego, solitary model of being an elected leader,” he tells me. “We’ve certainly seen that in some other mayors of this city I have much more of a Movement mentality. It’s much more of what I’m steeped in. I don’t think it is first and foremost about me. It’s about the ideas and the agenda.... What I think it is about me is I’m not afraid to try these new things.”

In person, the first thing you notice is de Blasio’s height; he is six feet five inches and looks taller. Like some tall people, he can seem awkward in public situations. He is not a natural orator, nor does he possess either charisma or gravitas. At the American Museum of Natural History, where he oversees a press conference, he relies on an uneasy smile, chuckles, and lame wisecracks. Asking for questions and getting no more, he says, “Going once ... going twice.” His style is that of a nervous suburban dad trying to be cool in front of his teenager’s pals, an updated version of Clark Griswold from National Lampoon’s Vacation. He is much better in small groups, holding eye contact, smiling easily, and speaking in complete sentences. “I think the most amazing thing is, when I introduce him to people, I’d say almost 90 percent of the time I get a phone call or an e-mail the next day saying, ‘Wow, I can’t believe how smart he is,’” says Glen. “No, it’s true. I think there’s some weird perception out there that he’s not very smart.” De Blasio is by nature and training a coalition builder, who easily draws input from everyone in a room, even skeptics. At a meeting with African-American executives seeking greater access to city contracts, he makes sure every last attendee, all 25 of them, gets a chance to speak. It’s an approach that offsets the stridency of some of his campaign rhetoric. “I had been a little bit skeptical about his reaching out to the business community, because obviously, from the get-go, there was a bit of a schism,” says Jerry Speyer, a founding partner of the real-estate colossus Tishman Speyer, whose holdings include such New York properties as Rockefeller Center and the Chrysler Building. “But I can tell you, and I’ve known every mayor since John Lindsay, I’ve been extremely impressed. The one thing I appreciate is he really solicits candor and open discussion. He is enormously respectful. We don’t agree on a lot of things, but from the first time we spoke, I came away and felt, Gee, I can talk to this man.” By the time the meeting with African-American executives is over he is running 45 minutes behind schedule. Referring to his chronic tardiness, de Blasio admits, “People in that meeting had valid complaints I could have said, ‘O.K., only five people get to speak, and we’re out of here.’ Presidential-style I do feel it’s my obligation to listen, sometimes to a fault I don’t want to have a meeting and leave the room without resolution I understand why it’s something I have to do better on.” I ask de Blasio how he sleeps. “Physiologically, my perfect day would be to stay up until two and get up at nine I’ve had to adapt. Now I get up at six. I do think [my] body is adjusting to that. Too many days I’m up at three or four and I can’t get back to sleep.” A different de Blasio emerges when he is tired, as at a late-afternoon meeting with staff implementing the pre-K program. In the middle of City Hall’s cavernous Blue Room, beneath the gaze of an immense portrait of founding father Alexander Hamilton, the mayor sits alone on one side of a hollowed rectangle of adjoining tables, tie removed, sleeves rolled above the elbow; the others sit across from him, servile and subordinate. He has heard this all many times; he swallows at least three yawns. He sprawls, his arms enveloping adjacent chairs, then grows fidgety, his hands roaming his face, rubbing his neck and forehead, fingers picking at some unseen blemish. He talks with his hands, with a lot of pointed index fingers. With staff he has no problem brandishing authority. “All right, what else?” he says several times.

De Blasio’s management style is a work in progress— the City of New York, after all, is the first organization of any size he has ever managed, an observation that draws scoffs from his advisers. “Name me five mayors who ran anything at all before they ran a city,” snaps Glen. “Name five that ran anything bigger than a hair salon. What did [former Obama White House chief of staff and current Chicago mayor] Rahm Emanuel run before he was mayor? What did [former academic and current Los Angeles mayor] Eric Garcetti run? That’s crazy.” A person who deals regularly with the mayor’s office on behalf of an organization he runs compares de Blasio’s management style with those of two previous New York mayors. “[Rudy] Giuliani’s people were thugs,” he says. “Bloomberg was pretty great because even if he didn’t care about an initiative personally, if his people liked it, he let them run with it. The problem with de Blasio is that he’s a micromanager. Everything has to go up to the top, to him. And his people, though they all seem well meaning, are often not as efficient as they might be or as qualified for their posts as you might wish.” Says a longtime political operative who admires the mayor, “I’ve known Bill a long time, and he is really more like a liberal professor or political activist than he is actually a mayor. If you look at mayors around the country, look at Rahm in Chicago, Garcetti in L.A., they tend to be more nonpartisan than not. They tend to be problem solvers: ‘What’s the problem? What’s the solution?’ Bill comes from a very different perspective.

When Bill is presented with a problem, I always imagine him musing, ‘Hmm, what’s my political philosophy on this?’ He’s not a natural manager—I mean, that’s an understatement.” “Every mayor has a troubled transition, but eventually he learns,” says a longtime Democratic consultant who worked in the Koch and Dinkins administrations. “I wish I could see some progress toward that. I wish I could see better people around him. There is no steady hand behind the wheel in City Hall. I wish I could see more attention to governance issues. And I don’t see it. I’m not alone. It’s a common view among people I talk to.” Another common criticism is that de Blasio is prone to shooting from the hip, which can inflame situations that with time might be handled more diplomatically. A prominent figure in the New York media world cites the flap during the 2013 mayoral campaign that de Blasio waded into over the horse-drawn carriages in Central Park. The carriages, driven by men and women in top hats, are, for visitors and natives alike, the picture-perfect New York postcard scene, capturing the romance and timelessness of the city. But to the surprise of veteran New York politicians the carriages became a major wedge issue in the race. Citing cruelty to the horses, a coalition of horse-lovers helped unseat the frontrunner for the Democratic nomination Christine Quinn, who did not support the ban. But de Blasio swiftly embraced it, vowing to make the banning of the horses happen during his first week in office if elected. And yet, on fine summer days in New York, if you head to the corner of Fifth Avenue and Central Park South, you will still see the carriages lined up, waiting to take you on a ride through the park. For, despite his vow, which, bizarre as it might seem, is still remembered by New Yorkers, de Blasio never found the votes in the City Council to accomplish what became one of his most famous promises.

It underscores his main leadership problem: that he often does not clearly think through the ramifications of an idea he espouses (horses may be euthanized, carriage drivers will be out of a job) or figure out a strategy to accomplish it. This allows him to be outmaneuvered time and time again, on such issues as banning charter schools from using city buildings or capping the number of Uber cars in the city. “Sometimes he wades into issues that are not all that substantive, which people get agitated about,” says Blackstone’s James. “The Uber thing jumps to mind. He doesn’t have to do that. The horse-drawn carriage is another thing. A totally unnecessary controversy. I would like him to be a little more like a C.E.O., you know, let your team take care of these things, take some time, make some recommendations, and these things would just fade away.” For all the complaints, City Hall under de Blasio has been a surprisingly tight ship.

There have been few significant media leaks and little sign of the kind of turf wars and infighting that commonly infest a new administration. “He made clear from the beginning he wanted a ‘coherence’ in point of view; he wanted people who believed the things we believe,” says First Deputy Mayor Anthony Shorris, who handles much of the actual day-to-day city management. “Some people want a ‘Team of Rivals.’ That’s not our thing. It makes it much easier for everyone to get along, much easier for everyone to get their jobs done, and much easier to delegate.”

The New New Normal

While de Blasio’s agenda may have struck a chord during an election year when the world was buzzing about “the 1 percent,” it was the optics of his family that made the difference, many observers believe. The de Blasios feature a German-Italian dad, a black onetime-gay mom, and two offspring, Dante and Chiara, all happily ensconced in their brick-and-clapboard row house in Brooklyn.

Black, white, Italian, L.G.B.T.—the de Blasios are like a sitcom family cast to appeal to every voting block short of Hasidic Jews. It was Dante’s famous 30-second TV testimonial to his father’s progressive policies, which ended with the surprise reveal that Dante was the white candidate’s black son, that, many people believe, won his father the election. “That ad killed us,” a competitor said afterward. Without his family, de Blasio’s life story is messier. His real name, after all, is not Bill de Blasio. He was born Warren Wilhelm Jr. in 1961, in New York City, though his parents called him “Bill” from an early age. He grew up in Boston; he remains a die-hard Red Sox fan—anathema for New York Yankee fans. De Blasio’s father, Warren senior, was a onetime business reporter at Time magazine, who was wounded during World War II and clearly suffered post-traumatic stress of some kind. He was an alcoholic. He and his wife divorced when de Blasio was seven; 10 years later, his father committed suicide, shooting himself outside a Connecticut hotel. De Blasio was raised in the bosom of his mother’s Italian family and ended up taking their last name as his own, though he didn’t change it legally until 2001. He left Boston to attend New York University in 1979 and never went back. After graduate school and several years supporting progressive Central American causes, he began climbing the political ladder, volunteering for David Dinkins’s mayoral campaign in 1989, working as an aide in the Dinkins administration, then running Representative Charles Rangel’s successful congressional campaign in 1994. Then came a job at the Department of Housing and Urban Development, a stint as campaign manager of Hillary Clinton’s 2000 senatorial campaign, and finally the first election of his own in 2001, when de Blasio won a seat on the New York City Council. He met his wife at City Hall, working for Dinkins. “I met him right around the corner there. Want to see the spot?” asks Chirlane McCray, who, between a peripatetic career in New York journalism and public relations, was writing speeches for Dinkins at the time. New York’s first lady comes across as serene and cerebral; de Blasio rarely misses a chance to call her his most important adviser. In 2009 de Blasio won election as the city’s public advocate, a kind of consumer-affairs commissioner, a position that was well suited to his crusaderism.

Four years later, in January 2013, he announced for mayor, one more ho-hum Democrat in a crowded field hoping to succeed Bloomberg. For six months no one paid much attention to him. But buoyed by his single-minded focus on income inequality and affordable housing, he started to inch up in the polls during the summer of 2013. Then “the Dante commercial” lit a fire beneath his campaign that carried him to victory over Christine Quinn. It did not hurt that the Democratic field was badly fractured, or that all one needed to win the primary was to secure 40 percent of the vote, which de Blasio accomplished by securing exactly 40 percent of the vote. Though he eventually won the mayoralty with 73 percent of the vote, it was the lowest turnout since 1917. Even today, there are many who feel he is an accidental mayor. “The founding myth of the de Blasio administration is that people heard his transcendent vision about income inequality and there was a mandate for that,” says the operative and longtime acquaintance of the mayor’s, “when in fact there was a win by default. He was elected because he was running against three Democrats and a Republican who ran a shitty campaign.... He has taken this as a mandate for running this city on what he campaigned on. Bill thinks he was elected on income inequality, and he wasn’t. I think he misunderstands the electorate.”

The tone of de Blasio’s tenure as mayor was set in its opening days, when a January storm inundated the city with nearly a foot of snow. The next morning residents of Park Avenue were flabbergasted to find many of the Upper East Side’s streets unplowed; many plows, it turned out, had been dispatched to less affluent neighborhoods, in Brooklyn and Queens. When not one but two Upper East Side grandes dames tripped on potholes and broke their ankles it became urban legend that de Blasio had declared war on Manhattan’s elite.

By far the roughest moments of de Blasio’s first year involved the police. The “Black Lives Matter” movement, which caught fire in Ferguson, Missouri, in 2014, sent crowds of protesters into New York City’s streets. De Blasio pointedly refused to condemn their accusations of routine police racism, infuriating the head of the Patrolmen’s Benevolent Association, Patrick Lynch. When a mentally troubled man shot and killed two policemen last December, Lynch memorably told reporters de Blasio had “blood on his hands.” Much of the N.Y.P.D. went on a kind of work strike and seemed to be refusing to make minor arrests or write tickets; only the hard lobbying of de Blasio’s heralded police chief, William Bratton, a veteran commissioner of the Giuliani years, managed to bring matters to an uneasy truce. While Lynch and other union officials declined comment for this article, their hatred of de Blasio—there’s no other word for it—has clearly not gone away. “He is not running the city of New York,” Lynch told one group earlier this year, according to Capital New York. “He thinks he’s running a fucking revolution.” Worse was yet to come: also in December, near the height of tensions, de Blasio told a press conference how, as the father of a black teenager, he had several times cautioned Dante to be careful when dealing with the police. “We’ve had to literally train him,” he said, “as families have all over this city for decades, in how to take special care in any encounter he has with the police officers who are there to protect him.” Lynch responded by saying de Blasio had thrown the N.Y.P.D. “under the bus.” At his City Hall office, I ask the mayor whether he believes young men of color still have reason to fear the police. De Blasio chooses his words carefully. “It’s not about stereotyping a whole police force or the officers within it,” he says. “It’s about a history we’ve inherited that rightfully leaves a lot of parents of color—and I am not a person of color, but I have a child who is of color—it leaves you aware of the need that they understand how to make sure they understand some of the challenges.... I simply said something out loud that hundreds of thousands of people in this city could identify with.... Why can’t we be honest about that and recognize it’s something we need to overcome? I think we’re in the process of overcoming it. I think that conversation’s going to be a lot more rare over the next 10 or 20 years from now, but we’re not quite there yet.”

Talk to many political pundits in New York and they will say, off the record and under their breath, that de Blasio favors the needs of blacks and Latinos over whites, the have-nots over the haves. And yet, despite the fact that he carried 96 percent of the black vote, relations between de Blasio and the city’s black leaders have steadily deteriorated. Part of it was de Blasio’s refusal to clean house at the N.Y.P.D.; part of it was that early on he consulted with the Reverend Al Sharpton, who is openly hostile to many of the city’s longtime black leaders, some of whom now feel de Blasio is taking them for granted. The city's most prominent black leader is the Reverend Calvin Butts, of Harlem's Abyssinian Baptist Church. When I talked to him in July and mentioned the mayor, he was breathing fire. "De Blasio, in the words of the Stevie Wonder song, 'you ain't done nothing,'" the reverend said barely 30 seconds into our conversation. "I can't even get in to see his commissioners. I've built thousands of units of affordable housing. I think I met with his office of economic development once. I've created the first high school in the black community in 50 years, in Harlem, and I can't even meet the [schools] chancellor. His administration is disorganized. You hear these complaints from other people, not just me. I think he feels comfortable in whoever is advising him that the black community is in his pocket. It's not. If he's really with us, stick with us. I need a John Brown [the white abolitionist who advocated armed insurrection] type. I feel strange saying this, but 'People in the black community, please, don't be taken for a ride by this man.'" The reverend was just getting warmed up. He attacked the mayor for failing to put a total end to stop-and-frisk; for hiring Bratton, an architect of "broken windows" policing of minor violations like loitering; and especially for failing to fire the officer whose choke hold led to the death of a black man, Eric Garner, in Staten Island last summer. "He's using taxpayer money to support a murderer." Reverend Butts and other clergy met with de Blasio last spring to air these concerns. "We put pressure on him as the clergy," Butts told me, "and as the result of that pressure he plays to the media, then he tries the old slave-master trick of divide and conquer.... [With de Blasio] it's all a trick. You have no power, no say. His administration is not following through [on its promises], and I think, you know, it's because he's not a tough administrator, a tough C.E.O. "We've seen liberal racists before," Butts concludes. "I'm not going to call him a racist just yet. I just think that his posture shows great disrespect for the black and brown communities. Great disrespect. I will not call him the r-word. But it's terrible now. It's condescending." When I mention Reverend Butts's anger to Glen, she doesn't appear concerned. In fact, she rolls her eyes. "I've known the reverend for 30 years," she says with a sigh. "He's never been a happy camper."

When you get down to it, managing the five boroughs is only half of any New York City mayor's job. The other half is dealing with the state capital, in Albany, where the fate of countless city measures rests in the hands of a hostile Republican-led State Senate and, above all, in those of Democratic governor Andrew Cuomo. The open secret of de Blasio's power is that he doesn't have that much. He manages the city and negotiates contracts with police, firemen, and teachers, but he can work only with the tools that state legislators grant him. The sole tax he controls is the property tax, which no mayor dares raise. "You sit down there as a mayor and you believe you're the captain of the ship," an unnamed state official told the New York Daily News this summer, "but really everything is subject to state law. You want to change the speed limit? You want to put in red light cameras? You need to flush the toilet? You need a state law. And that's jarring." That unnamed official, almost certainly the same one who characterized de Blasio to The Wall Street Journal as "bumbling and incompetent," is believed by some to be none other than the governor himself. And, in fact, Cuomo hasn't denied it when asked—which only begins to get at the central challenge of de Blasio's second year in office: the Andrew Problem. Though they are both Democrats and have long taken pains to play nice in public, Cuomo has undermined the mayor at seemingly every opportunity. De Blasio's frustration finally boiled over in June, when he stunned the New York political world by openly excoriating Cuomo to reporters as a bully bent on "revenge" for de Blasio's daring to disagree with him. Many insiders felt the mayor was committing political suicide. "What we have here is a situation where de Blasio was turning the other cheek constantly," says Alan Chartock, a longtime political pundit in the state capital. "I kept saying, What the hell is going on here? De Blasio helped him a lot in his last election, you know. He saved Andrew's ass. You would think that Andrew would say thank you. On the contrary.

Every time de Blasio turns around, he's been hit on the head by Andrew. Why is de Blasio being so compliant? Everyone says the city is a creature of the state, he has to kiss Andrew's ass. And, of course, it turns out that the more he kissed the more Andrew went into his bully mode. I don't think de Blasio had any choice. He had to do it, or he looked absolutely feckless." De Blasio won't discuss it, but it's not hard to get a sense of his thinking if you hang around City Hall long enough. The two men go back: Cuomo was the Department of Housing and Urban Development (hud) secretary when de Blasio was working there. Twenty years ago de Blasio viewed Cuomo as the next great hope of the Democrats. Today he sees him as a hostage to Wall Street bankers and hedge-funders. Tensions between the governor and the mayor were rising even before de Blasio took office. His signature initiative, a prekindergarten program, needed a half-billion dollars in funding, and de Blasio was intent on raising income taxes on wealthy New Yorkers to get it. But Cuomo was up for reelection and made it clear he would never raise taxes in an election year. Instead, he came up with the money from state funds. De Blasio, rather than happily accepting the governor's largesse, continued to demand the tax hike for months afterward, until it became clear the Legislature would never pass it. De Blasio, it should be pointed out, made things far tougher on himself when he openly campaigned to unseat many of the very Republican legislators he needed to get this and other measures passed.

Matters came to a head in the spring of 2014 when de Blasio was to lead an Albany demonstration organized by the teachers' union against the spread of charter schools—private schools that receive government funding, which liberals feel weakens the public school system. Instead of joining him, as de Blasio had hoped, Cuomo helped organize a pro-charter demonstration the very same day. According to insiders, de Blasio angrily confronted the governor afterward. He left feeling nothing was settled. For months de Blasio searched for a favor he could do Cuomo that would require repayment when the Legislature reconvened last January. He found his chance last summer when the governor, whose re-election was expected to be a cakewalk, encountered not only a surprisingly strong Republican opponent, Rob Astorino, but the threat of a thirdparty candidate from the progressive Working Families Party, or W.F.P., a group de Blasio knew well. De Blasio, in a series of late-night meetings, prevailed on W.F.P. leaders to back Cuomo in return for several promises from the governor, including that he would campaign on behalf of liberal Democrats and raise the state minimum wage. "Bill went way out on a limb for Andrew," says a de Blasio partisan. "It was a very personal appeal. He put a lot of his capital on the line." When Cuomo expressed his gratitude, de Blasio felt he finally had the governor in his camp. But then came last winter's angry confrontations with the N.Y.P.D. De Blasio waited for a supportive statement from Cuomo. It never came. When the officers turned their backs on him, de Blasio again waited for Cuomo to say something in support. More silence.

According to the de Blasio partisan, the mayor confronted Cuomo afterward. "The answer Bill got was unsatisfactory," says this person. But, for de Blasio, the final straw came when Cuomo refused to follow through on any of his promises to the W.F.P. "The mayor was astounded," says one person in his camp. Matters only got worse during the legislative session that began in January. De Blasio badly needed a complicated new tax deal to spur the building of affordable housing; Cuomo tried to block it. De Blasio also wanted an extension of mayoral control over city schools; Cuomo tried to block it. The mayor ultimately won a compromise version of both measures, but it was the Legislature's decision in June to grant him only one year of control over the schools—Bloomberg had been given seven—that drove de Blasio over the edge. "That was the moment for Bill, that was the ultimate offense," says one Democratic power broker. As this article goes to press, relations between de Blasio and Cuomo remain frigid. What that means for New York City going forward, no one knows. But it's clear de Blasio will not deviate from his agenda, of which he remains enormously proud; at one point in our discussions he even compared it to F.D.R.'s New Deal. It may not be the New Deal, but de Blasio has racked up more substantive successes than his critics are willing to concede. Besides the pre-K program, the new contracts negotiated with almost every municipal union, and the expanded paid sick leave, he all but stopped the N.Y.P.D.'s controversial stop-and-frisk policy (a tactic Bloomberg had already begun reining in), and unveiled a $41 billion plan to preserve or build 200,000 units of affordable housing over the next decade. "This is not partisan radical stuff," says Alicia Glen. "The fact that this is being sort of couched in 'We're so lefty' is so fascinating because 90 percent of what we're doing is just basic good business principles.

Of course you'd have paid sick leave. Of course you'd have better wages. Of course you'd be investing in infrastructure I don't think it's that we're so radical. I think it's that the rest of the country has gone so crazy. Building rental housing? If that makes you a crazy lefty, I don't know what's going on in the world That's a sad statement about how far to the right and crazy the country has gotten." Love him or hate him, the smart money in New York City says that de Blasio is virtually ensured a second term. "What Manhattanites in the 'Bloomberg Bubble' don't understand," says the organization head who deals regularly with the mayor's office, "is that many people in the outer boroughs love him as much as Manhattanites hate him. But even more important is that the city's builders love him, and they have always elected the mayor in New York City, by funneling more money than anyone else to their chosen candidate. Why do they love de Blasio? Because he doesn't give a damn about urban planning, density, or architecture. He only cares about more affordable housing. For the builders that means they get to build an extra 20 floors and do it with fewer restrictions." "Being progressive in a municipal sense is investing in the people that make cities great," Glen says. "We try to use cities to raise people up, right? That's the history of cities. Why do people go to Rome instead of staying on their chicken farm in the middle of God knows where? Because cities are where opportunity and innovation happen." Thus a city, she argues, is the perfect place for a crusade like de Blasio's. "It is the petri dish," she concludes, "where people can get shit done." ❖

Raymond Kelly, Ex-Police Commissioner, Blames Mayor de Blasio for Rise in Killings
NEW YORK TIMES - Sam Roberts - September 7, 2015

Former Police Commissioner Raymond W. Kelly said last week that Mayor Bill de Blasio's constraints on the stop-and-frisk strategy of the Bloomberg administration was to blame for the uptick in murders in New York City. Mr. Kelly also attributed the rise in homicides in other cities to a backlash to the killing last year of an unarmed black teenager by a white police officer in Ferguson, Mo.

³Murders are up,² he said in an interview in conjunction with the release of his memoir. ³And if you have a propensity to carry a gun and there's a policy to de-emphasize stop and question and frisk, it's only common sense you'll see more people carrying guns and more crime.²

Mr. Kelly's book, ³Vigilance: My Life Serving America and Protecting Its Empire City,² was written with Ellis Henican, a Newsday columnist, and is being released on Tuesday by Hachette Books.

Mr. Kelly, now president of risk management services for the real estate company Cushman & Wakefield, defined what some experts have called the Ferguson Effect as ³a reluctance to engage.²

³These police officers have been given signals directly and indirectly to stand down and not be as proactive as in the past,² he said. ³If they choose to disengage, there's no penalty. That's the primary reason for the increase in murder. Police are reacting to what has been happening in Ferguson: They are less willing to engage, and that translates into more violence and more death.²

After years of declines, dozens of cities have reported sharp increases in murders.

Correlating police stops with crime is troublesome.

In New York, Mr. de Blasio and Police Commissioner William J. Bratton said last week that this summer had been the safest on record, even as stops had declined 93 percent since 2011. Still, the overall number of murders is 8 percent higher since the start of the year compared with the same period last year. Also, Mr. Kelly writes that stops were a deterrent, and that ³you can't measure the amount of crime that wasn't committed.²

Karen Hinton, a spokeswoman for Mr. de Blasio, a Democrat, said on Monday that more officers had been trained to end distrust caused by ³severe enforcement of stop-and-frisk in the past.² Stops should still be employed ³when appropriate,² she said, but ³to change course now, with overall crime rates lower than in many previous years, including 2014, would not be wise.²

Despite a spate of racially charged deaths around the country of unarmed civilians, either in police custody or while being arrested, Mr. Kelly writes, ³it is simply not true, statistically speaking, that American police are on a murderous rampage.²

To clear the air, though, he urges the release of the testimony made before the grand jury that chose not to indict police officers in the 2014 death of Eric Garner on Staten Island. And he writes, ³unarmed people should not end up dead, even if they are suspected of wrongdoing.²

In ³Vigilance,² Mr. Kelly delivers a withering attack against Judge Shira Scheindlin of United States District Court, who ruled in August 2013 that police stops violated the constitutional rights of minorities. The case was initiated in 1999, before Mr. Kelly began his second term as commissioner. Mr. de Blasio declined to appeal her ruling.

³De Blasio shrugged and walked away from a routine and useful policing tool, snatching law enforcement defeat from the jaws of legal victory,² Mr. Kelly writes.

After Judge Scheindlin¹s decision, the number of stops declined precipitously. Asked in the interview why the administration of Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg, a political independent, continued to be defensive about the policy and did not claim credit for the decline, Mr. Kelly attributed the decrease in part to better oversight but largely to a local version of the Ferguson Effect: the self-restraint of individual officers.

To claim credit for the decline, he said, ³would¹ve said the policy was somehow inappropriate.²

In fact, he not only unapologetically defended the peak number of stops < 685,000 in 2011 < but also writes that on the basis of descriptions of suspects provided by victims of violent crimes, ³we were proportionally understopping African-Americans, not overstepping them.²

³Vigilance² reveals some personal glimpses. Mr. Kelly was a crime victim for the first time at 8, mugged with a friend in Central Park by several boys armed with a baseball bat.

Before Mr. Bloomberg was elected mayor, he had suggested Mr. Kelly become schools chancellor.

³That seemed like a stretch at the time,² Mr. Kelly recalled. ³I¹d never taken an education course. I¹ve never even taught second grade. As I would discover later, Bloomberg is a big believer in the notion that a strong manager can manage anything.²

In the book, Mr. Kelly mostly avoids score-settling. He barely mentions his two-time successor, Mr. Bratton (whom he called ³a competent law enforcement professional² in the interview), though he attributes a good deal of the decline in crime under Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani, a Republican whom Mr. Bratton served as commissioner, to the expansion of the police force approved when David N. Dinkins, a Democrat, was mayor and Mr. Kelly was his commissioner.

³The Giuliani administration had only to pass out the uniforms and send the new recruits onto the street,² Mr. Kelly writes. ³It was the Dinkins administration that handed Giuliani and Police Commissioner Bill Bratton the single most valuable tool for turning campaign rhetoric into practical policy.²

³Vigilance² describes 16 potential terrorist plots that were foiled and also Mr. Kelly¹s efforts to fortify the new World Trade Center. As a result, the site was shifted and the skyscraper reinforced. Suppose his sons asked him if they should take a job in 1 World Trade Center today?

³I'd tell them yes,² Mr. Kelly said in the interview.

Bill de Blasio's Battle to Save New York—and Himself

Fog hovered over Jamaica Bay that morning, November 12, as dozens of grieving families gathered for the memorial service in Rockaway Park, along the water in a far precinct of Queens. They had come to mark the 13th anniversary of the crash of American Airlines Flight 587, a flight headed to the Dominican Republic that instead ended up in flames in Far Rockaway, killing 260 people on board, as well as 5 on the ground. Mayor Bill de Blasio was scheduled to arrive at 9:05, 11 minutes before a uniformed officer was to ring a silver bell noting the exact time of the crash. But at 9:05 there was no sign of the mayor, who was on a police launch en route. For several minutes family members stared in disbelief, some shaking their heads; the previous mayor, Michael Bloomberg, had always come early and taken his time speaking with them. When 9:16 came with still no sign of the mayor, the police officer with the bell stood motionless, unsure what to do. Finally one of the mourners, Miriam Estrella, stepped to the podium. "I'm sorry, everyone," she said. "Sorry our mayor's not here." The officer rang the bell. Nine minutes later de Blasio arrived, strode to the podium, and made a speech that did little to calm the furious families. The mayor's staff blamed the fog. But confronted by reporters later that day, de Blasio admitted he simply hadn't gotten out of bed in time. "I had a very rough night, woke up sluggish, and I should have gotten myself moving quicker," he explained. "I just woke up in the middle of the night, couldn't get back to sleep, and felt really sluggish and off-kilter this morning." It wasn't the first—or the last—time de Blasio was late for an official function.

In December he showed up two hours late to a murdered police officer's wake, arriving as it ended. During Saint Patrick's Day festivities he achieved the trifecta of being late for three events in a row: a celebratory breakfast and reception at Gracie Mansion—"his own house," The New York Times noted in italics; a Mass at St. Patrick's Cathedral, which Cardinal Timothy Dolan started without him ("Mayor de Blasio, we're happy you're here," Dolan said when the mayor finally arrived); and a parade in the Rockaways, which the mayor missed half of. The crowd booed when he arrived. A few chanted, "Worst mayor ever." "I'm not hired by the people to go to parades," de Blasio said grumpily afterward. Chronic tardiness is just one of the complaints New Yorkers have voiced about their mayor of not quite 21 months. On the Upper West Side the gripes are about potholes; on the Upper East Side, uncollected garbage; in Greenwich Village the talk is of abandoned storefronts occupied by the homeless. After 20 years of plunging crime rates, crime is again part of the New York conversation. After de Blasio criticized "stop-and-frisk"—detaining and searching people without probable cause—the N.Y.P.D. rose in open revolt against him last winter when two officers were murdered. At the funerals the policemen turned their backs on the mayor en masse.

Bill de Blasio is unlike any New York mayor in recent memory, a staunch progressive, a crusader against income inequality and for affordable housing, a man who has as little use for Park Avenue elites as they do for him. In terms of the national political scene, that makes him a far more significant figure on the left than any New York mayor in years. In fact, if you believe that the popularity of politicians such as Massachusetts senator Elizabeth Warren and Vermont senator Bernie Sanders represents a new “progressive moment” in American politics, it’s de Blasio who is the one who bears watching. He is the only progressive governing anything of note, and while mayor of New York has historically been a dead-end job for those seeking higher office, it’s clear his ambitions aren’t confined to the city limits. How far left is de Blasio? This is a man who cut his teeth during the 1980s raising money and distributing food for Nicaragua’s Communist Sandinista government, who later married an African American woman who once identified as a radical lesbian, and who honeymooned in Cuba.

A speaker at his inauguration memorably called New York a “plantation,” referring to inequality in the city. This kind of talk scares a lot of New Yorkers, especially those who had warmed to the safer, sparkling city that emerged after 12 years of Mayor Michael Bloomberg, a Wall Street-trained management professional, who disdained partisan politics. Asked whom de Blasio can be compared to, one of his three deputy mayors, Alicia Glen, 48, says, “I don’t know. No doubt there is some hippie mayor somewhere who is focused on these issues. Maybe Jerry Brown when he was mayor of Oakland.” What appears to incense many New Yorkers I spoke with is not only de Blasio’s personal style but also a sense that he, unlike Bloomberg, cares far more about politics and his pet projects than actually managing the city. “Most whites I know are left of center, and virtually every one of them can’t stand the guy—and these are all Obama-walks-on-water types,” says a journalist who has covered the city for 40 years. “This sanctimonious arrogance [he has] just irritates people. But it’s more than that. There’s no sense this man has any interest, unlike Bloomberg, in the nuts and bolts of how the city works. He’s lazy. He shows up late. He insults people by keeping them waiting, and he shrugs it off—‘Oh, it’s not important I’m here on time; it matters what happens when I show up.’ But it does matter. Part of me wonders if he really wants to be mayor. I wonder if the whole idea bores him, if all he really cares about is being a national figure on progressive issues.” “I don’t know whether he’s lazy,” says Mitchell Moss, a onetime Bloomberg adviser who now teaches urban policy and planning at NYU Wagner. “I do know he’s the first mayor in recent history to call in sick. O.K.? He doesn’t have any of that natural comfort with the details of government.

People want him to reflect the tone of the city, but his agenda is one agenda and nothing else: income inequality and affordable housing. He doesn’t care about parks or potholes or anything else. He has two issues [income inequality and affordable housing] and two issues only.” “I think people feel that it’s not a mayor’s prime responsibility to try to lower income inequality,” says Heather Mac Donald, of the conservative Manhattan Institute. “Managing New York is enough. If you can keep the streets fixed and maintain discipline in the schools, that is a challenge enough. If you can prove you have the management mettle to do that, then maybe you take on income inequality. To declare [that issue] as your primary mission as mayor strikes people as grandiose. There is a certain messianic quality that he actually thinks he can solve income inequality. I would argue that that is at the very least a premature goal, but most likely a preposterous one. To the extent that income inequality can be addressed by public policy, which is a real question, it certainly can’t be done at a local level.”

In late July, I followed the mayor through a working day and sat with him for two lengthy discussions, one off the record, over bottles of Brooklyn Lager on the porch at Gracie Mansion (the Colonial mansion that is the official residence of New York mayors), the second, on the record, at his City Hall office. When I asked him if he’s aware of the perception that he has little interest in the details of city management, de Blasio's eyes flashed. "Sure," he said. "And it's wrong. But I hear it all the time." He pursed his lips. "It wouldn't be hard to research the truth," he added, "and a lot of people don't bother. I came in saying I was going to change things and acted on it, and I think there are some people who don't like the changes, so they fill in the blanks any way they want. It's inconvenient to their critique of me if I'm handling the budget well, or handling labor relations well, or making the trains run on time. So it doesn't shock me." "I do believe [the elites] all think we're raving Communists," says Alicia Glen, who joined de Blasio's team in 2013, after working at Goldman Sachs. "That's an easy, cocktail-party throwaway line. People are lazy. People love the familiar. Most of the people in [City Hall now] are not familiar to [our critics]. In the past 12 years they've been hanging out at [East Hampton's posh private golf course] the Maidstone Club with [Bloomberg's people] and it's been really nice and easy.... But at the end of the day ... paid child care, building rental housing, creating a ferry system—these are things any smart person running a city would be doing. The fact that these people don't go to the same golf club as Bill de Blasio? O.K., whatever. That's all this is about." De Blasio's people are quick to point out the initiatives he has introduced that are having a tangible impact on the lives of thousands of poor people and undocumented immigrant New Yorkers, whom they feel Bloomberg ignored. The mayor's centerpiece achievement has brought free pre-kindergarten education to every New York family and free after-school programs for most—a boon for working parents. He has also introduced mandatory paid sick leave and an ambitious program for city identification cards for undocumented residents, allowing them access to city services and facilities.

Such achievements have earned de Blasio praise from unexpected quarters. "I understand why people are concerned, because some of what he says is a little scary," says Hamilton James, president of Blackstone, the big Wall Street investment firm. "But can they object to universal pre-K? Of course not. [His deals with] the unions? He's actually cut deals that are better than most of us thought he could get. He's gotten an awful lot done in a short time." "A lot of people, white people, really want to hate this guy," says a veteran City Hall reporter who knows the mayor well. "You know, helping all these poor people? It's not pretty politics. No one wants to watch this get done. But it's what he promised. And it's what he's doing." Nevertheless many New Yorkers—and not just the Manhattan elites—appear unconvinced, and de Blasio's poll numbers reflect it. A Quinnipiac University Poll in early August found that only 33 percent of New York City voters rated life in the city "very good" or "good"—the lowest number ever measured by the university, and 47 percent believed de Blasio does not deserve re-election. His critics would have you believe de Blasio is New York's most reviled mayor ever. Does he deserve it?

I first catch up with the mayor happily on schedule as he lopes through the bowels of the American Museum of Natural History on his way into the subway. On the platform, flanked by his security detail, he greets a pair of uniformed cops as the B train roars into the station. At first, no one inside the halfempty car recognizes the familiar figure in their midst. "There's two types of rides," de Blasio tells me, grasping a center pole. "One, when no one notices me. Two, when the whole car presses forward and everyone wants selfies. It's a little surreal. Sometimes I miss my old life." Sitting to one side, a middle-aged African-American woman makes eye contact.

“You’re a handsome guy!” she exclaims. De Blasio steps over for a hug. As if on cue, a pair of city workers step up for handshakes and selfies. De Blasio smiles and accommodates. We talk about his past role models in the job. “La Guardia was a big part of it,” he says, mentioning Fiorello La Guardia, the popular mayor of New York in the 1930s and 40s. “He was the first true progressive mayor and was beloved in a way none of us will ever achieve. New York is a very emotional place, a lot of big emotions, and everyone is pressed together so tightly. And La Guardia brought this real sense of caring, of a personal give-and-take with every New Yorker. After that, people had this new vision of the mayor.” At West Fourth Street, de Blasio strides up a flight of stairs and boards the A train, which takes him toward City Hall. This time he is noticed and consents to a dozen more selfies. “How you doing, brother?” he asks one young African-American man who hangs back. The man beams. Of the 25 or so people who approach during our ride, at least three-quarters are black, perhaps unsurprisingly, since de Blasio has a black wife and his Yale-bound son has an enormous Afro. “And then Ed Koch,” de Blasio continues, “he borrowed the template from La Guardia, a real expectation of how the mayor has to be.” I remark that, political philosophies aside, de Blasio’s style bears little resemblance to that of La Guardia (a publicity-hungry dynamo obsessed with infrastructure) or Koch (a publicity-hungry lovable obnoxious-uncle type). De Blasio, by comparison, can come off as a wallflower. There is no sense of alpha male about him. “There is a heavy-ego, solitary model of being an elected leader,” he tells me. “We’ve certainly seen that in some other mayors of this city... I have much more of a Movement mentality. It’s much more of what I’m steeped in. I don’t think it is first and foremost about me. It’s about the ideas and the agenda.... What I think it is about me is I’m not afraid to try these new things.”

In person, the first thing you notice is de Blasio’s height; he is six feet five inches and looks taller. Like some tall people, he can seem awkward in public situations. He is not a natural orator, nor does he possess either charisma or gravitas. At the American Museum of Natural History, where he oversees a press conference, he relies on an uneasy smile, chuckles, and lame wisecracks. Asking for questions and getting no more, he says, “Going once ... going twice.” His style is that of a nervous suburban dad trying to be cool in front of his teenager’s pals, an updated version of Clark Griswold from National Lampoon’s Vacation. He is much better in small groups, holding eye contact, smiling easily, and speaking in complete sentences. “I think the most amazing thing is, when I introduce him to people, I’d say almost 90 percent of the time I get a phone call or an e-mail the next day saying, ‘Wow, I can’t believe how smart he is,’” says Glen. “No, it’s true. I think there’s some weird perception out there that he’s not very smart.” De Blasio is by nature and training a coalition builder, who easily draws input from everyone in a room, even skeptics. At a meeting with African-American executives seeking greater access to city contracts, he makes sure every last attendee, all 25 of them, gets a chance to speak. It’s an approach that offsets the stridency of some of his campaign rhetoric. “I had been a little bit skeptical about his reaching out to the business community, because obviously, from the get-go, there was a bit of a schism,” says Jerry Speyer, a founding partner of the real-estate colossus Tishman Speyer, whose holdings include such New York properties as Rockefeller Center and the Chrysler Building. “But I can tell you, and I’ve known every mayor since John Lindsay, I’ve been extremely impressed. The one thing I appreciate is he really solicits candor and open discussion. He is enormously respectful. We don’t agree on a lot of things, but from the first time we spoke, I came away and felt, Gee, I can talk to this man.” By the time the meeting with African-American executives is over he is running 45 minutes behind schedule. Referring to his chronic tardiness, de Blasio admits, “People in that meeting had valid complaints… I could have said, ‘O.K., only five people get to speak, and we’re out of here.’ Presidential-style… I do feel it’s my obligation to listen, sometimes to a fault… I don’t want to have a meeting and leave the room without resolution… I understand why it’s something I have to do better on.” I ask de Blasio how he sleeps. “Physiologically, my perfect day would be to stay up until two and get up at nine… I’ve had to adapt. Now I get up at six. I do think [my] body is adjusting to that. Too many days I’m up at three or four and I can’t get back to sleep.” A different de Blasio emerges when he is tired, as at a late-afternoon meeting with staff implementing the pre-K program. In the middle of City Hall’s cavernous Blue Room, beneath the gaze of an immense portrait of founding father Alexander Hamilton, the mayor sits alone on one side of a hollowed rectangle of adjoining tables, tie removed, sleeves rolled above the elbow; the others sit across from him, servile and subordinate. He has heard this all many times; he swallows at least three yawns. He sprawls, his arms enveloping adjacent chairs, then grows fidgety, his hands roaming his face, rubbing his neck and forehead, fingers picking at some unseen blemish. He talks with his hands, with a lot of pointed index fingers. With staff he has no problem brandishing authority. “All right, what else?” he says several times.

De Blasio’s management style is a work in progress— the City of New York, after all, is the first organization of any size he has ever managed, an observation that draws scoffs from his advisers. “Name me five mayors who ran anything at all before they ran a city,” snaps Glen. “Name five that ran anything bigger than a hair salon. What did [former Obama White House chief of staff and current Chicago mayor] Rahm Emanuel run before he was mayor? What did [former academic and current Los Angeles mayor] Eric Garcetti run? That’s crazy.” A person who deals regularly with the mayor’s office on behalf of an organization he runs compares de Blasio’s management style with those of two previous New York mayors. “[Rudy] Giuliani’s people were thugs,” he says. “Bloomberg was pretty great because even if he didn’t care about an initiative personally, if his people liked it, he let them run with it. The problem with de Blasio is that he’s a micromanager. Everything has to go up to the top, to him. And his people, though they all seem well meaning, are often not as efficient as they might be or as qualified for their posts as you might wish.” Says a longtime political operative who admires the mayor, “I’ve known Bill a long time, and he is really more like a liberal professor or political activist than he is actually a mayor. If you look at mayors around the country, look at Rahm in Chicago, Garcetti in L.A., they tend to be more nonpartisan than not. They tend to be problem solvers: ‘What’s the problem? What’s the solution?’ Bill comes from a very different perspective.

When Bill is presented with a problem, I always imagine him musing, ‘Hmm, what’s my political philosophy on this?’ He’s not a natural manager—I mean, that’s an understatement.” “Every mayor has a troubled transition, but eventually he learns,” says a longtime Democratic consultant who worked in the Koch and Dinkins administrations. “I wish I could see some progress toward that. I wish I could see better people around him. There is no steady hand behind the wheel in City Hall. I wish I could see more attention to governance issues. And I don’t see it. I’m not alone. It’s a common view among people I talk to.” Another common criticism is that de Blasio is prone to shooting from the hip, which can inflame situations that with time might be handled more diplomatically. A prominent figure in the New York media world cites the flap during the 2013 mayoral campaign that de Blasio waded into over the horse-drawn carriages in Central Park. The carriages, driven by men and women in top hats, are, for visitors and natives alike, the picture-perfect New York postcard scene, capturing the romance and timelessness of the city. But to the surprise of veteran New York politicians the carriages became a major wedge issue in the race. Citing cruelty to the horses, a coalition of horse-lovers helped unseat the frontrunner for the Democratic nomination Christine Quinn, who did not support the ban. But de Blasio swiftly embraced it, vowing to make the banning of the horses happen during his first week in office if elected. And yet, on fine summer days in New York, if you head to the corner of Fifth Avenue and Central Park South, you will still see the carriages lined up, waiting to take you on a ride through the park. For, despite his vow, which, bizarre as it might seem, is still remembered by New Yorkers, de Blasio never found the votes in the City Council to accomplish what became one of his most famous promises.

It underscores his main leadership problem: that he often does not clearly think through the ramifications of an idea he espouses (horses may be euthanized, carriage drivers will be out of a job) or figure out a strategy to accomplish it. This allows him to be outmaneuvered time and time again, on such issues as banning charter schools from using city buildings or capping the number of Uber cars in the city. “Sometimes he wades into issues that are not all that substantive, which people get agitated about,” says Blackstone’s James. “The Uber thing jumps to mind. He doesn’t have to do that. The horse-drawn carriage is another thing. A totally unnecessary controversy. I would like him to be a little more like a C.E.O., you know, let your team take care of these things, take some time, make some recommendations, and these things would just fade away.” For all the complaints, City Hall under de Blasio has been a surprisingly tight ship.

There have been few significant media leaks and little sign of the kind of turf wars and infighting that commonly infest a new administration. “He made clear from the beginning he wanted a ‘coherence’ in point of view; he wanted people who believed the things we believe,” says First Deputy Mayor Anthony Shorris, who handles much of the actual day-to-day city management. “Some people want a ‘Team of Rivals.’ That’s not our thing. It makes it much easier for everyone to get along, much easier for everyone to get their jobs done, and much easier to delegate.”

The New New Normal

While de Blasio’s agenda may have struck a chord during an election year when the world was buzzing about “the 1 percent,” it was the optics of his family that made the difference, many observers believe. The de Blasios feature a German-Italian dad, a black onetime-gay mom, and two offspring, Dante and Chiara, all happily ensconced in their brick-and-clapboard row house in Brooklyn.

Black, white, Italian, L.G.B.T.—the de Blasios are like a sitcom family cast to appeal to every voting block short of Hasidic Jews. It was Dante’s famous 30-second TV testimonial to his father’s progressive policies, which ended with the surprise reveal that Dante was the white candidate’s black son, that, many people believe, won his father the election. “That ad killed us,” a competitor said afterward. Without his family, de Blasio’s life story is messier. His real name, after all, is not Bill de Blasio. He was born Warren Wilhelm Jr. in 1961, in New York City, though his parents called him “Bill” from an early age. He grew up in Boston; he remains a die-hard Red Sox fan—anathema for New York Yankee fans. De Blasio’s father, Warren senior, was a onetime business reporter at Time magazine, who was wounded during World War II and clearly suffered post-traumatic stress of some kind. He was an alcoholic. He and his wife divorced when de Blasio was seven; 10 years later, his father committed suicide, shooting himself outside a Connecticut hotel. De Blasio was raised in the bosom of his mother's Italian family and ended up taking their last name as his own, though he didn't change it legally until 2001. He left Boston to attend New York University in 1979 and never went back. After graduate school and several years supporting progressive Central American causes, he began climbing the political ladder, volunteering for David Dinkins's mayoral campaign in 1989, working as an aide in the Dinkins administration, then running Representative Charles Rangel's successful congressional campaign in 1994. Then came a job at the Department of Housing and Urban Development, a stint as campaign manager of Hillary Clinton's 2000 senatorial campaign, and finally the first election of his own in 2001, when de Blasio won a seat on the New York City Council. He met his wife at City Hall, working for Dinkins. "I met him right around the corner there. Want to see the spot?" asks Chirlane McCray, who, between a peripatetic career in New York journalism and public relations, was writing speeches for Dinkins at the time. New York's first lady comes across as serene and cerebral; de Blasio rarely misses a chance to call her his most important adviser. In 2009 de Blasio won election as the city's public advocate, a kind of consumer-affairs commissioner, a position that was well suited to his crusaderism.

Four years later, in January 2013, he announced for mayor, one more ho-hum Democrat in a crowded field hoping to succeed Bloomberg. For six months no one paid much attention to him. But buoyed by his single-minded focus on income inequality and affordable housing, he started to inch up in the polls during the summer of 2013. Then "the Dante commercial" lit a fire beneath his campaign that carried him to victory over Christine Quinn. It did not hurt that the Democratic field was badly fractured, or that all one needed to win the primary was to secure 40 percent of the vote, which de Blasio accomplished by securing exactly 40 percent of the vote. Though he eventually won the mayoralty with 73 percent of the vote, it was the lowest turnout since 1917. Even today, there are many who feel he is an accidental mayor. "The founding myth of the de Blasio administration is that people heard his transcendent vision about income inequality and there was a mandate for that," says the operative and longtime acquaintance of the mayor's, "when in fact there was a win by default. He was elected because he was running against three Democrats and a Republican who ran a shitty campaign.... He has taken this as a mandate for running this city on what he campaigned on. Bill thinks he was elected on income inequality, and he wasn't. I think he misunderstands the electorate."

Comment [IP11]: Fact check: Mayor de Blasio secured exactly 40.3 percent of the vote.

The tone of de Blasio's tenure as mayor was set in its opening days, when a January storm inundated the city with nearly a foot of snow. The next morning residents of Park Avenue were flabbergasted to find many of the Upper East Side's streets unplowed; many plows, it turned out, had been dispatched to less affluent neighborhoods, in Brooklyn and Queens. When not one but two Upper East Side grandes dames tripped on potholes and broke their ankles it became urban legend that de Blasio had declared war on Manhattan's elite.

By far the roughest moments of de Blasio's first year involved the police. The "Black Lives Matter" movement, which caught fire in Ferguson, Missouri, in 2014, sent crowds of protesters into New York City's streets. De Blasio pointedly refused to condemn their accusations of routine police racism, infuriating the head of the Patrolmen's Benevolent Association, Patrick

Lynch. When a mentally troubled man shot and killed two policemen last December, Lynch memorably told reporters de Blasio had “blood on his hands.” Much of the N.Y.P.D. went on a kind of work strike and seemed to be refusing to make minor arrests or write tickets; only the hard lobbying of de Blasio’s heralded police chief, William Bratton, a veteran commissioner of the Giuliani years, managed to bring matters to an uneasy truce. While Lynch and other union officials declined comment for this article, their hatred of de Blasio—there’s no other word for it—has clearly not gone away. “He is not running the city of New York,” Lynch told one group earlier this year, according to Capital New York. “He thinks he’s running a fucking revolution.” Worse was yet to come: also in December, near the height of tensions, de Blasio told a press conference how, as the father of a black teenager, he had several times cautioned Dante to be careful when dealing with the police. “We’ve had to literally train him,” he said, “as families have all over this city for decades, in how to take special care in any encounter he has with the police officers who are there to protect him.” Lynch responded by saying de Blasio had thrown the N.Y.P.D. “under the bus.” At his City Hall office, I ask the mayor whether he believes young men of color still have reason to fear the police. De Blasio chooses his words carefully. “It’s not about stereotyping a whole police force or the officers within it,” he says. “It’s about a history we’ve inherited that rightfully leaves a lot of parents of color—and I am not a person of color, but I have a child who is of color—it leaves you aware of the need that they understand how to make sure they understand some of the challenges.... I simply said something out loud that hundreds of thousands of people in this city could identify with.... Why can’t we be honest about that and recognize it’s something we need to overcome? I think we’re in the process of overcoming it. I think that conversation’s going to be a lot more rare over the next 10 or 20 years from now, but we’re not quite there yet.”

Talk to many political pundits in New York and they will say, off the record and under their breath, that de Blasio favors the needs of blacks and Latinos over whites, the have-nots over the haves. And yet, despite the fact that he carried 96 percent of the black vote, relations between de Blasio and the city’s black leaders have steadily deteriorated. Part of it was de Blasio’s refusal to clean house at the N.Y.P.D.; part of it was that early on he consulted with the Reverend Al Sharpton, who is openly hostile to many of the city’s longtime black leaders, some of whom now feel de Blasio is taking them for granted. The city’s most prominent black leader is the Reverend Calvin Butts, of Harlem’s Abyssinian Baptist Church. When I talked to him in July and mentioned the mayor, he was breathing fire. “De Blasio, in the words of the Stevie Wonder song, ‘you ain’t done nothing,’” the reverend said barely 30 seconds into our conversation. “I can’t even get in to see his commissioners. I’ve built thousands of units of affordable housing. I think I met with his office of economic development once. I’ve created the first high school in the black community in 50 years, in Harlem, and I can’t even meet the [schools] chancellor. His administration is disorganized. You hear these complaints from other people, not just me. I think he feels comfortable in whoever is advising him that the black community is in his pocket. It’s not. If he’s really with us, stick with us. I need a John Brown [the white abolitionist who advocated armed insurrection] type. I feel strange saying this, but ‘People in the black community, please, don’t be taken for a ride by this man.’” The reverend was just getting warmed up. He attacked the mayor for failing to put a total end to stop-and-frisk; for hiring Bratton, an architect of “broken windows” policing of minor violations like loitering; and especially for failing to fire the officer whose choke hold led to the death of a black man, Eric Garner, in Staten Island last summer. “He’s using taxpayer money to support a murderer.”

Reverend Butts and other clergy met with de Blasio last spring to air these concerns. “We put pressure on him as the clergy,” Butts told me, “and as the result of that pressure he plays to the media, then he tries the old slave-master trick of divide and conquer.... [With de Blasio] it’s all a trick. You have no power, no say. His administration is not following through [on its promises], and I think, you know, it’s because he’s not a tough administrator, a tough C.E.O. “We’ve seen liberal racists before,” Butts concludes. “I’m not going to call him a racist just yet. I just think that his posture shows great disrespect for the black and brown communities. Great disrespect. I will not call him the r-word. But it’s terrible now. It’s condescending.” When I mention Reverend Butts’s anger to Glen, she doesn’t appear concerned. In fact, she rolls her eyes. “I’ve known the reverend for 30 years,” she says with a sigh. “He’s never been a happy camper.”

When you get down to it, managing the five boroughs is only half of any New York City mayor’s job. The other half is dealing with the state capital, in Albany, where the fate of countless city measures rests in the hands of a hostile Republican-led State Senate and, above all, in those of Democratic governor Andrew Cuomo. The open secret of de Blasio’s power is that he doesn’t have that much. He manages the city and negotiates contracts with police, firemen, and teachers, but he can work only with the tools that state legislators grant him. The sole tax he controls is the property tax, which no mayor dares raise. “You sit down there as a mayor and you believe you’re the captain of the ship,” an unnamed state official told the New York Daily News this summer, “but really everything is subject to state law. You want to change the speed limit? You want to put in red light cameras? You need to flush the toilet? You need a state law. And that’s jarring.” That unnamed official, almost certainly the same one who characterized de Blasio to The Wall Street Journal as “bumbling and incompetent,” is believed by some to be none other than the governor himself. And, in fact, Cuomo hasn’t denied it when asked—which only begins to get at the central challenge of de Blasio’s second year in office: the Andrew Problem. Though they are both Democrats and have long taken pains to play nice in public, Cuomo has undermined the mayor at seemingly every opportunity. De Blasio’s frustration finally boiled over in June, when he stunned the New York political world by openly excoriating Cuomo to reporters as a bully bent on “revenge” for de Blasio’s daring to disagree with him. Many insiders felt the mayor was committing political suicide. “What we have here is a situation where de Blasio was turning the other cheek constantly,” says Alan Chartock, a longtime political pundit in the state capital. “I kept saying, What the hell is going on here? De Blasio helped him a lot in his last election, you know. He saved Andrew’s ass. You would think that Andrew would say thank you. On the contrary.

Every time de Blasio turns around, he’s been hit on the head by Andrew. Why is de Blasio being so compliant? Everyone says the city is a creature of the state, he has to kiss Andrew’s ass. And, of course, it turns out that the more he kissed the more Andrew went into his bully mode. I don’t think de Blasio had any choice. He had to do it, or he looked absolutely feckless.” De Blasio won’t discuss it, but it’s not hard to get a sense of his thinking if you hang around City Hall long enough. The two men go back: Cuomo was the Department of Housing and Urban Development (hud) secretary when de Blasio was working there. Twenty years ago de Blasio viewed Cuomo as the next great hope of the Democrats. Today he sees him as a hostage to Wall Street bankers and hedge-funders. Tensions between the governor and the mayor were rising even before de Blasio took office. His signature initiative, a prekindergarten program, needed a half-billion dollars in funding, and de Blasio was intent on raising income taxes on wealthy New Yorkers to get it. But Cuomo was up for reelection and made it clear he would never raise taxes in an election year. Instead, he came up with the money from state funds. De Blasio, rather than happily accepting the governor's largesse, continued to demand the tax hike for months afterward, until it became clear the Legislature would never pass it. De Blasio, it should be pointed out, made things far tougher on himself when he openly campaigned to unseat many of the very Republican legislators he needed to get this and other measures passed.

Matters came to a head in the spring of 2014 when de Blasio was to lead an Albany demonstration organized by the teachers' union against the spread of charter schools—private schools that receive government funding, which liberals feel weakens the public school system. Instead of joining him, as de Blasio had hoped, Cuomo helped organize a pro-charter demonstration the very same day. According to insiders, de Blasio angrily confronted the governor afterward. He left feeling nothing was settled. For months de Blasio searched for a favor he could do Cuomo that would require repayment when the Legislature reconvened last January. He found his chance last summer when the governor, whose re-election was expected to be a cakewalk, encountered not only a surprisingly strong Republican opponent, Rob Astorino, but the threat of a thirdparty candidate from the progressive Working Families Party, or W.F.P., a group de Blasio knew well. De Blasio, in a series of late-night meetings, prevailed on W.F.P. leaders to back Cuomo in return for several promises from the governor, including that he would campaign on behalf of liberal Democrats and raise the state minimum wage. "Bill went way out on a limb for Andrew," says a de Blasio partisan. "It was a very personal appeal. He put a lot of his capital on the line." When Cuomo expressed his gratitude, de Blasio felt he finally had the governor in his camp. But then came last winter's angry confrontations with the N.Y.P.D. De Blasio waited for a supportive statement from Cuomo. It never came. When the officers turned their backs on him, de Blasio again waited for Cuomo to say something in support. More silence.

Comment [IP13]: FACT CHECK: Mayor de Blasio headlined the de Blasio administration's pre-K rally in Albany that had nothing to do with charter schools. There was a charter school rally announced afterwards that was held the same day in Albany to distract from the City's pre-K rally.

According to the de Blasio partisan, the mayor confronted Cuomo afterward. "The answer Bill got was unsatisfactory," says this person. But, for de Blasio, the final straw came when Cuomo refused to follow through on any of his promises to the W.F.P. "The mayor was astounded," says one person in his camp. Matters only got worse during the legislative session that began in January. De Blasio badly needed a complicated new tax deal to spur the building of affordable housing; Cuomo tried to block it. De Blasio also wanted an extension of mayoral control over city schools; Cuomo tried to block it. The mayor ultimately won a compromise version of both measures, but it was the Legislature's decision in June to grant him only one year of control over the schools—Bloomberg had been given seven—that drove de Blasio over the edge. "That was the moment for Bill, that was the ultimate offense," says one Democratic power broker. As this article goes to press, relations between de Blasio and Cuomo remain frigid. What that means for New York City going forward, no one knows. But it's clear de Blasio will not deviate from his agenda, of which he remains enormously proud; at one point in our discussions he even compared it to F.D.R.'s New Deal. It may not be the New Deal, but de Blasio has racked up more substantive successes than his critics are willing to concede. Besides the pre-K program, the new contracts negotiated with almost every municipal union, and the expanded paid sick leave, he all but stopped the N.Y.P.D.'s controversial stop-and-frisk policy (a tactic Bloomberg had already begun reining in), and unveiled a $41 billion plan to preserve or build 200,000 units of affordable housing over the next decade. "This is not partisan radical stuff," says Alicia Glen. "The fact that this is being sort of couched in 'We're so lefty' is so fascinating because 90 percent of what we're doing is just basic good business principles. Of course you'd have paid sick leave. Of course you'd have better wages. Of course you'd be investing in infrastructure. I don't think it's that we're so radical. I think it's that the rest of the country has gone so crazy. Building rental housing? If that makes you a crazy lefty, I don't know what's going on in the world... That's a sad statement about how far to the right and crazy the country has gotten." Love him or hate him, the smart money in New York City says that de Blasio is virtually ensured a second term. "What Manhattanites in the 'Bloomberg Bubble' don't understand," says the organization head who deals regularly with the mayor's office, "is that many people in the outer boroughs love him as much as Manhattanites hate him. But even more important is that the city's builders love him, and they have always elected the mayor in New York City, by funneling more money than anyone else to their chosen candidate. Why do they love de Blasio? Because he doesn't give a damn about urban planning, density, or architecture. He only cares about more affordable housing. For the builders that means they get to build an extra 20 floors and do it with fewer restrictions." "Being progressive in a municipal sense is investing in the people that make cities great," Glen says. "We try to use cities to raise people up, right? That's the history of cities. Why do people go to Rome instead of staying on their chicken farm in the middle of God knows where? Because cities are where opportunity and innovation happen." Thus a city, she argues, is the perfect place for a crusade like de Blasio's. "It is the petri dish," she concludes, "where people can get shit done." ♦

I've attached a draft. I think there are more places we can chime in and pushback.

Can folks review and let me know places where we think we can add push back. Even Q polls during campaign if we want to cite issues ppl cared about...that type of thing.

Reminder: It'll look like link below where an annotated version of our article will be avail for folks - can add pushback, context, addtl links and reminders, etc -

I can do post early tomorrow AM -- if folks think what I have is enough, can do that. If we want to wait and get more in, can hold too.

Pls advise.

Thanks for sending this.

I'm a little concerned that this draft still has a lot of the same holes and questions as the one we looked at a week ago, despite the fact that Emmy and Karin and team have sent over a lot of suggestions and answers. I think it is important that someone find the time to incorporate the material we provided, including Emmy's comments, which I have reattached here. Otherwise it will seem tomorrow like we have made much less progress than we have.

On the major initiatives, let me summarize a few of the main changes here:

- * On second grade reading, we cannot propose an outcome goal because we don't have a way of measuring this yet. Instead, we will propose an input goal, which is that every elementary school will have a reading specialist to help struggling readers get and stay on track. We can also say that we will develop a way to measure and manage this that relies on teachers assessments, and not the introduction of another high-stakes test in 2nd grade.

- * On the "single shepherd," we are now proposing to pilot this in two districts (7 in the South Bronx and 23 in Central Brooklyn) but only for grades 6-12. I strongly urge a new name for this, but I think others will have to convince the boss on this.

- * Instead of College Visits for All, we are proposing a more flexible approach that allows high schools to choose 3 from a menu of programs to help kids get ready and excited for college. We will send along a brief on that. But I think for the speech you can and should say, "We will make sure every middle and high school has the resources and support they need to provide college visits for all students.

- * We want to describe Algebra for All as "ensuring that all children can complete 4 years of high school math by ensuring that they have the access and support they need to complete algebra no later than 9th grade." After discussing with the experts, we are concerned that a singular focus on algebra on 8th grade is unrealistic and unproductive for us.

- * We are not clear what is happening with the CUNY ASAP proposal. We should decide before this next meeting whether it remains in this speech or is held for a separate event on postsecondary persistence and graduation.

Other thoughts on this draft:

* The tagline "Every day, every step of the way" is fine, but Carmen recently introduced "Every student, every day" as her "mantra" and it accomplishes a lot of the same. In fact, I like its emphasis on focusing on one student at a time. Maybe good to have the two system leaders using the same line. You could also combine them.

* I don't think the inequities on p. 1 are the right ones. DOE actually does a pretty good job of making sure facilities and textbooks are equitable. We have a renewal school with a snazzy new greenhouse, for example, and Fair Student Funding has helped a lot. We should focus on the real inequity -- that fewer students at some schools gain the skills they need to succeed.

* Along the same lines, I'd like to say something about how poverty and lack of opportunity for families contributes to that inequity. The administration is trying to address it on all fronts, and all the efforts reinforce one another.

* I'm nervous about the use of NAEP scores. Karin, could you share the sources on that? I'm sure they're right, I just want to understand them better.

* We are no longer the first city to offer computer science for all, as San Francisco recently beat us to the punch, but we are by far the biggest.

* I think the accountability language at the end of the current draft belongs somewhere in pp. 5-6 where you refer to our overall approach. It is important that somewhere he mention the framework or the elements of the framework, or it sounds like he isn't paying attention to the main way we are measuring school progress. One short reference will do it. If you want to say more, we can say that the new School Quality Snapshots, which will replace the report cards and the single letter grade, are coming out in October.

Can we see a new turn tonight or early tomorrow am?

Thanks,

Josh

Education Vision 2015: Updated August 31, 2015

Equity and Excellence: Every Day, Every Step of the Way

Last Wednesday, 1.1 million children put another New York City summer behind them and started the school year.

Could you feel that tidal wave of emotion crash over the whole City, as it always does on that first day? So much joy, excitement, trepidation abounded on sidewalks, in school hallways and lobbies, in cars and buses and trains ferrying families to school in neighborhoods from the South Bronx to the South Shore.

Chirlane and I know those emotions well. Actually, this September is the first in 17 years we haven't been among the public school parents waving goodbye at the entrance. . .swallowing an ocean of feelings as Dante or Chiara walked away into the school year.

We know that families of every kind, in all our city's neighborhoods, share these first-day feelings. But, for many, the common experience of education stops there.

Maybe, once all the parents finally left, a teacher in one school took his new charges to tour a gleaming greenhouse, while a few miles away another was forced to shuffle desks so the leaky roof overhead wouldn't drip down on students.

Maybe in one classroom, students were the first to crack open the latest edition of a classic novel; while across town, it was two students to a tattered old copy, its spine nearly broken from decades of use.

One set of kids is no more deserving of a greenhouse or a falling-apart book than any other. Each is owed the opportunity to have their future determined by hard work and unique talents, as it should be.

But too many of our children's economic futures will be defined by the economic pasts of their neighborhoods. This status quo is unacceptable, un-American, and unfaithful to the legacy and to the promise of New York City.

We all have a stake in its change. As taxpayers, we all pay for public school. As Americans, its value is entrenched in our moral DNA. We've inherited a belief so strong it's almost biological: that this land's richness and riches derive from the success of its people—and this success is available to anyone who puts in the time and the sweat to earn it. Success is not the privilege of a few, but the right of all.

Public education is mandated by law because it is how this core American value should come to life. It's obvious and it's inevitable, it's what makes this country great: our children must go to school, there will always be a school for them to go to, and that school can be a springboard to success for each child.

In other words, our schools must be built on a foundation of both equity and excellence. These principles need to operate hand in hand as the twin engines of our city's large and powerful education system.

We have so much to be proud of—there are so many schools and so many kids who express the city's commitment to equity and excellence each day. In fact, we literally have some of the best students in the country. On a national scale, New York City's children academically outperform than their counterparts in eight of the country's 10 biggest cities. Our low-income students are the highest-performing of all 10 cities. And the one city that outpaces us by a couple of measures is San Diego – a district with one-tenth the students and 5x the funding for each one. Our kids have an awe-inspiring ability to do more with less.

To fully appreciate the achievements of today's educators and students, we must also take a moment to see how far we've come. . .and the hard work of our predecessors who enabled reforms in the school system that spurred much of this progress. Had the Administration of Mayor Bloomberg not pushed for and acquired Mayoral Control of the Schools, we probably would not be graduating X more high schoolers than we were ten years ago, and Y more than 20 years ago—the highest graduation rate in the city's history. Test scores have increased LA LA LA WHAT PROGRESS HERE OVER WHAT TIME FRAME?.

Comment [LE1]: 17,000 more students graduated in 2014 than in 2005. We do not have graduation data per the same methodology prior to the class of 2001

Comment [LE2]: Test scores haven actually decreased as the tests have become more rigorous. See p. 4 in this deck- http://schools.nyc.gov/NR/rdonlyres/C7E210CA-F686-4805-BEA6-EDD91F76E58B/185429/2015MathELAPublicDeck81215_SITE.pdf

The 2014 graduating class had fewer dropouts than any other since NYC started keeping records. And—this is a less scientific but no less meaningful measure—the great majority of the city’s students and parents like their schools.

Comment [LE3]: We had 7300 dropouts from the class of 2010 (2014 graduation) vs. 16,300 from the class of 2001 (2005 graduation)

Clearly, the city is blessed with smart, hardworking, dedicated and determined children, parents, and educators. Together, they write success stories that transform lives and lift up communities.

There simply have not been enough of those success stories. And too often, those there are emanate from the same neighborhoods—neighborhoods where the school roof doesn’t leak, and the books shine like the glass of the greenhouse. Our education system has been rife with division, and students have paid the price.

The Tale of Two Cities in our schools is unacceptable. But we believe it is NOT inevitable. And we came to City Hall to undo it. [this could use more]

Our vision for the city’s public schools is anchored by a fundamental belief in our children – in every child. We won’t choose among our children who will succeed and who will not.

We believe that every student has both the right and the ability to awaken their minds to the world, to set forth on their journey with the skills, courage and confidence to reach their full potential. Every child can grow into a successful adult—ready for college, ready for life—if their education gives them the right tools.

Over the past 18 months, we have forged those tools. They are powerful instruments of equity and excellence, for our schools and for our students—every day, every step of the way.

Let there be no mistake: the “way” I speak of leads to and includes college.

I often say that education determines economic destiny more now than at any point in human history. Nowhere is that clearer than when looking at the way a life veers towards success when a person completes college. An adult with only a HS diploma is almost three times as likely to be in poverty in NYC as someone with a bachelor's degree or higher, and earns $1.1 million less over the course of a lifetime. [Source: CEO]

And our success as a 21st century global city depends on readying students for success in higher education. Our children are counting on us, but we are counting on THEM to keep New York the most competitive city in the world.

In just five years, two-thirds [65% -- NEED HARD #] of NYC jobs are projected to require some college. [Source: CEO]. For generations, our workforce has been made up of the brightest minds from all over the world, drawn like magnets to the greatest city on earth. That attraction shows no sign of letting up, nor do we want it to, in order to keep the innovative and international flavor that makes us great. But we need more talent, and we need to grow it right here at home

So: we have set three connected goals around higher education to lift up more of our children and meet the needs of a growing, thriving city.

First, we're going to graduate more kids. Right now, 20,000 students who begin high school in New York City each year do not finish. By 2020, 75% of our high school students will graduate within four years. That will mean an extra 5,000 graduates each year from 2020 on. OR: By 2026, 80% of our students will graduate within four years. That will mean an extra X,000 graduates each year—or more—from 2026 on. Another way to think about it: over ten percent more of all the second graders who just started school will collect their high school diploma.

Comment [LE4]: 8,740. Can call it 9,000 to sound rounder

Second, we will make more of those diplomas carry graduates to and through college. Right now, fewer than half [48%] of our high school graduates are college-ready— meaning they truly have the skills to absorb the material taught in a college course. And in nearly half of our high schools [X%?], fewer than 10% of the graduating class is actually ready for college by these standards.

Comment [LE5]: 41% of schools. Need to calculate what percent of kids that is since some of these schools have very small cohorts.

Think about that for a moment. Almost half our schools essentially graduate kids who will find college frustrating, alienating, and probably “not for them” simply because they can't understand what they are being taught in college. Their only university path would include remedial work, which adds time and expense to the college journey that many of these students just don't have.

And in a day and age when a college degree is the ticket to a good job, a pathway to the middle class and the most important determining factor to lifelong economic security—we cannot allow this status quo to continue.

So our college readiness goal is two-fold. First of all, we will take the number of public high school graduates who are ready for college from fewer than half [48%] to two-thirds (65%) by 2025 [HOW MANY ACTUAL GRADS IS THAT?].

Comment [LE6] : Today it's 25,735. 65% would take us up to 34,000 kids. Need to double check this data before it's speech ready as there are internal discrepancies

Second, we will make sure that every single high school in New York City is capable of graduating college-ready students. No longer will families worry that graduation is simply a seal of approval on the 15 years of the past, as opposed to a real promise for the future.

Excellence will not be portioned out for the lucky few, but equitably served to all our schools to lift up all our children.

Today I will clarify the vision of how we get there.

We are of course already hard at work, and in 18 months we've made some tremendous strides. We've planned, funded, and rolled out full-day, high-quality, universal pre-k, as well as an unprecedented expansion of after-school for middle schoolers. Test scores are up for the second consecutive year, and the first full year on our watch.

More efforts are underway than what's covered in the news, and we'll shine a light on them today. Still others you will hear about for the very first time. And as I share the work we are doing, so too will I illustrate the ideas that animate it—the ideas that underpin an equitable and excellent school system for every child.

We will start from a fundamental place: how the City works with those who teach our children. We have redefined this relationship, premised on the belief that we must work with educators, not against them. We must value their expertise and show respect for the work they do every day. We must work harder to retain our teaching talent. And, crucially, we must grow that talent by giving all our educators the training and development they need to deepen their skills.

This professional development is a cornerstone of our reforms in every grade, and something the Chancellor—who started as a rookie teacher and has had nearly every level of job in our public education system since—speaks about with particular passion. She believes that the best way to deepen teachers’ skills is to spread what works—connecting the whole education system so educators can lift each other up, with veteran educators spreading the practices that spur success to fellow teachers and principals.

Our goal is to make sure there ARE more veteran educators to do this in the years ahead. So we are laying the groundwork now to create more expert teachers for the future, who will in turn pay forward the wisdom and skills they acquired from those who taught them.

Certainly, the vast majority of our educators are talented, passionate, and deeply dedicated to their students and schools. There are, however, some teachers in our schools who should be in a learning environment. And those teachers will not remain there. We fundamentally believe in making the change that’s necessary to help schools succeed, and that has already driven us to remove 700+ teachers. In other cases, we will replace school leadership or transform a school itself if they cannot improve with our tailored and targeted support.

And working with our teachers, we have created several schools—PROSE Schools—that are not beholden to labor work rules, and therefore have the unique freedom to “color outside the lines.” We will take the most successful elements of these experiments in school administration and teaching and look hard at ways to bring them to other schools. . .allowing more educators to break through formerly impenetrable boundaries in the service of helping kids learn better.

Of course, we know that no two schools and no two children need the same support in order to excel. The unique chemistry of every single school means that each needs a different set of supports to offer the best for its students.

And each child will travel his or her own academic, social, and emotional journey. We can't, in the interest of wholesale success, sell education wholesale to all students. They're not our customers. They're our children.

That's why we have committed to going beyond academic matters to address the full slate of issues that really engineer success. The cornerstone of this is our Community Schools initiative – 130 schools across the city that support the needs of the whole child. Community Schools might provide counseling services so students have a safe place to share her struggles and successes alike. They offer free vision exams and glasses so kids can see the blackboard. They might have a food pantry so hunger doesn't distract from learning. They might offer English classes for families so parents can help kids with their homework.

And Community Schools are modeling communication and continuity within the school walls and outside them. These practices have inspired an idea that will directly connect more families across the city with the people and places that define a student's educational journey, and bring us one step closer to ending the era of families ricocheting around inside a mammoth bureaucracy.

We are piloting a program to give children and families who need it most a hand to hold from pre-K until they graduate from high school—a “single shepherd” to guide families through the educational journey. Beginning in one year in Brownsville, every single one of the district's XX families will have someone to guide them for the long term through the landscape of teachers and tests, someone to help clear the tough hurdles and celebrate strong successes.

Comment [LE7]: 10,459 students. Harder to calculate families (and number will be smaller)

In middle school, the [SHEPHERD] will develop the Student's Progress Pact, a living contract among our students, families, teachers, and school leaders. It will outline how each student will reach the goal of graduating from high school, making it to college, and succeeding all the way through.

Comment [LE8]: If we view this as an extension of today's guidance model, why not call it a counselor?

Let's imagine a few points on that journey for some of our children, across the city, over the course of their day.

We'll start first thing in the morning. It's 8am, and a four year-old is intently focused on building a tower of blocks, stacking carefully as her classmates play behind her – some singing with a teacher, some drawing early masterpieces, some gazing at beginner books. It's a lively and alive place, filled with the sounds and colors that awaken young children to the world.

This is the critical moment where success begins. We fundamentally believe all children must start their education earlier so they are poised to reap the benefits of kindergarten – and everything that comes after.

I'll repeat what I've said before: we cannot get education right if we do not get it right from the beginning. I'm very proud that last week, we started getting it right for 70,000 of our kids, who began our free, universal, high-quality pre-K. Block towers are rising all across this great city.

Around the same time, across town, a second grader rides the bus to school with a parent, proudly showing off the book the class has been reading—explaining what it's about and which character she played in a class activity yesterday. Her parent smiles and plays along—the second grader doesn't know that yesterday her parent and her teacher actually spoke about it on the phone. The teacher called for a few minutes just to let her know that the student did a great job, and share an update on her reading progress.

It's nearly impossible to overemphasize the value of these kinds of interactions—both the simple phone call from teacher to parent, and that moment of sharing between child and parent. Parents are the first and last teachers of children, and must be our partners in everything we do.

That's why we knocked on thousands of doors this summer to make sure families knew what to expect in the year ahead. It's why we instituted an unprecedented 40 minutes of teacher time dedicated solely to connecting with parents. Maybe this is the time during which our imaginary teacher made her phone call to share this news which doesn't just mean the world to the family, but also to all of us and all the educators. . .

Because one second grader’s proud announcement that he or she read lines in a class activity is one step closer to [our new goal of XX literacy for ALL second graders. Our goal is to have every single second grader reading, and, by 2017, to make sure every parent of a K-2 child knows their kid’s reading progress. We know that when parents know how their child is doing, they help their child do better.

Comment [LE9]: Our new goal of universal literacy for second graders, with an interim goal of 60% by 2025?

Comment [KB10]: Getting more specificity/clarity from DOE

This may sound ambitious—many other places hold 3rd grade as their reading standard. But the research is in. Kids who can read at grade level by the time they walk into their third grade classroom for the first time do [X BETTER – NEED TO QUANTIFY].

Comment [LE11]: Pick your fact:

Literacy at the end of third grade determines students’ ability to learn across all content areas; up to half of printed fourth grade curricula are incomprehensible to children who leave third grade below reading level

The foundational literacy skills developed in the early years are critical to the continued development of reading abilities: Third-grade reading level is a significant predictor of eighth-grade reading level, and three quarters of students who are poor readers in third grade will remain poor readers in high school. Students who are not reading proficiently by the end of third grade are four times more likely to drop out of high school than proficient readers. Conversely, students above grade level for reading in third grade graduate and enroll in college at higher rates than students at or below grade level.

Nor do we shy away from ambitious standards. Aiming high is one of our core principles—and simply part of who we are. New York has the most rigorous curriculum standards and administers the toughest tests in the nation. We expect everyone to embrace this aim for excellence, translate it into specific ambitions, and transform those ambitions into achievement.

And a word about how those tests fit into the broader picture. Yes, they are tough. But we treat tests as an important thing, not THE important thing. Tests only tell you that you need to improve and where that improvement is needed—not how to get it done. That’s where committed and talented teachers are necessary for success—where teachers like the one our second grader has makes all the difference.

A few hours later, it’s noon, and an eighth grader is hunched over an algebra book in the library. She finally solves $A^2 + B^2 = C^2$, sits back in wonder, and glances up at the clock to see how many minutes are left till her advisory session, when she can tell her adviser how hard it was—and how it feels to finally get it.

Our student been struggling with a lot of anger, frustration, and sadness this year, and her adviser’s office has been her sanctuary. They talk for half an hour, and then the adviser sends our student home with a family permission form to participate in a big day next week: a college tour. She'll be the first in her family to see the inside of a college classroom.

Middle school is a deeply important time. It's when an actual vision of success as an adult—college, a career—can come into focus. . .if we show it to our students. We are going to show them, and we are going to prepare them so that every middle school student is socially, emotionally, and academically ready for high school, and exposed to college by the time they enter 9th grade.

First, College Visits for All will come to every middle school by 20XX.

[DETAILS]

Second, we have zeroed in on one of the key skills that students need to stay on pace to get to college: algebra. Research shows it [WHAT ARE THE IMPROVEMENTS?], but students at lower-performing schools have been locked out of this because the schools do not offer it. But that's in the past. The future for our kids and our city is Algebra for All. Beginning in 20XX, every school in this city will offer algebra to their students as a central part of their preparation for high school and for life.

We won't relegate ANY of our kids to dreaming about aiming and achieving high—starting in middle school, we'll show them. We have already committed to getting 100,000 kids internships, mentorships, and summer jobs by 2025—including our most vulnerable children in foster homes and shelter. We are doubling down on that today: every middle and high school will have a business partner [EXPLAIN WHAT THIS IS/DOES].

These middle years can also be tremendously hard for many kids, and for their families—to this day I often say I'm a Recovering Middle School Parent. All this ambition, all these skills, will take root if and only if our kids are socially and emotionally ready for these experiences, and what's to come with the rigors of high school. And that's not easy for a lot of our kids, who are battling tough situations at home, or among their friends, or just with the difficulties of growing up.

Comment [LE12]: Every student will go on at least two college tours in middle school – one with their school and one with a parent – and at least two additional tours in high school. Exposing students and their families to college campuses beginning in middle school will reinforce a college-going mindset, encourage earlier conversations about college going, and motivate students to work toward college readiness. And continuing those tours in high school will keep students oriented toward higher education, and support students in identifying the strongest college fit.

My wife, Chirlane, has been deeply focused on the mental health needs of our kids. She's working with the Administration to revolutionize how we deal with mental health in this city, especially for those with the greatest need and the fewest options. You'll hear a lot more about that in the near future.

These battles can interfere with learning. And we are determined, as a City, to break down all barriers to learning so children come to school ready to succeed. We must fulfill our children's basic prerequisites to learning, accounting for mental and physical health, family stability and support, financial hurdles, and more. Community Schools are the bedrock of these efforts, and this month marks the moment when every last one of the 130 schools we have targeted completes its transformation into a Community School.

Time is passing: it's 3:30pm, and a tenth grader runs her fingers over the pages of her English Language Arts workbook. As a recent immigrant, she needs to pass the English Regents to graduate—so the school staff has created this extended learning period for her and the 15 other English Language Learners in the class. There's a little tap on her back, and our student turns to find a small folded-up piece of paper on the floor right next to her chair. (Some things never change. . .like passing notes in class.) She catches out of the corner of her eye a friend and fellow student grinning. She unfolds the note and reads: "Computer Lab before 2nd period tomorrow?"

Before we think about the computer lab tomorrow, let's think about where our students are right now. Extended learning time—an extra hour of instruction each day—is a hallmark of our 94 Renewal Schools. These 94 schools are those that have struggled the most to serve their students and families and provide a solid education to our children. So we are rolling out sweeping reforms that touch every part of those schools—transforming the classrooms and the culture to turn the tables of history for the school and its community. In addition to extra class time, Renewal Schools [XYZ DETAILS HERE OF THINGS THEY OFFER].

And it's working. [UPDATE WITH MOST RECENT STATS/STORIES OF HOW RENEWAL SCHOOLS ARE WORKING:

- Old info test scores are up in 2015 (0.6% in Math, 1.2% in English)

Comment [LE13]: -Director of School Renewal supporting principal in charting the school's new direction
-Supplemental teacher professional development, particularly around writing strategies and STEM
- On-site physical and mental health services, including vision screening for all students
-Enhanced school libraries
-Access to new digital books
-New writing programs / curricula

- Attendance - a leading indicator for academic improvements - improved year over year at 56 Renewal Schools.
 - Individual schools saw tremendous gains, such as an 8.1% improvement at Multicultural High School and a 4.6% improvement at JHS 022*

For too long, we haven't even given students the chance to aim high in high school, because they haven't been offered the chance to do advanced work—a chance that we know, when taken, correlates with success. You can't shoot for the moon if there's no rocket to take you there.

That ends today. Today we offer every high schooler the chance to aim and achieve high. We are introducing AP for All: bringing Advanced Placement classes to every high school by 20XX. Students who take AP classes later excel. .
 .[NEED EVIDENCE/RESEARCH SOUNDBITE].

And now, back to that computer lab. Both computer equipment and Computer Science training is a novelty for many students and teachers, including those at nearly all of our Renewal Schools. Fewer than 5% of all NYC public school students have an opportunity to learn Computer Science, and those that do are clustered in just a few high-performing schools.

This is not sustainable for students or for our city, which increasingly needs more people with the computer proficiency to power all kinds of companies, from tech to finance to health to fashion. Hundreds of thousands of good jobs will be accessible to those with computer science skills, and beyond the reach of those without them.

That is why we are immensely proud to announce today the launch of Computer Science for All, which will provide a computer science education to every single public school student within ten years through an $81 million public-private partnership between the City of New York and CSNYC.

This is the largest effort to expand computer science in the country. It will make New York the first school district in the nation to provide computer science to Comment [LE15]: In a study of students in Texas, those who took AP courses were twice as likely to graduate college in 5 year as compared to their peers who did not, with even more significant gains in minority and low-income populations. While passing an AP exam has a stronger correlation with college success, even exposure to the material can have a lasting impact; students who sat for an AP exam and only received a score of 1-2 (of 5) graduated college at a higher rate than their peers who did not take AP exams at all.

every student—and the first City to invest in the future of its students and its economy in this pioneering way.

Now it's 5pm. A recent graduate comes home from her summer job. She's done it—the days and nights of hard work, struggles and ultimately victories have earned her admission to college [CUNY?]. Money is tight for her, as it is for so many New Yorkers. So maybe she's working at a fast food restaurant, or cleaning hotel rooms to get by. She arrives home to a letter from her university. It's her fall semester reading list. Total price of textbooks: $600. She freezes.

Each year, 20,000 of the City's high school graduates do not enter college. They fall victim to the phenomenon of “summer melt,” where their ability or confidence to begin college in September simply melts away due to unexpected or onerous expenses, or paperwork, or simply uncertainty about how it could all possibly work.

But WE are here to declare that neither finances, fear, nor the unfamiliar will be a barrier to education and a life of success for our children. And our work to break down these barriers will not stop at high school graduation.

We are giving our students every support they need – including financial help for the things both in plain sight and hiding in the shadows, like textbooks.

We're doubling down on mentoring and advisement. [YMI, HS counselors? NEED MORE INFO ON COLLEGE-GOING CULTURE AND MINDSET INTERVENTIONS]. Readiness isn't just an academic state of mind or set of skills.

Comment [LE16]: More info coming soon.

And we are establishing for every child a college savings account, putting aside $50 for every child put aside the moment they enter our education system. [DETAILS]. This would transform the experience of our student confronted with hundreds of dollars in books. She wouldn't be cowed. She wouldn't freeze. She'd know it's there, and she's draw on her savings account and buy her books.

The sun is behind the skyline and it's 8:30pm. After a morning spent at a part-time job and classes all afternoon and into the evening, a college sophomore enters the subway and carefully puts away her Metrocard. At the right stop, she runs up the stairs and greets her study group inside a public library. They've ridden the train stations all over the City in order to be able to meet in one place and study for the next day's exam.

Right now, 17,000 students of our students who begin college do not finish—an unacceptable situation. Sometimes it's because of thing as basic as not being able to afford transportation to class.

Our student got her Metrocard through a CUNY program called ASAP. ASAP kids are given the support they need to succeed in this and every dimension. They receive Metrocard to get to class. They are given a designated cohort of students to travel with through the four years so peers can lift each other up.

We know it works: [EVIDENCE]. And it is now a national model, replicated in places like [XYZ].

That's why are investing to enroll 7 times as many students over the next four years. [3500 enrolled in FY15 vs 25,000 enrolled in FY19]. [MORE METRICS/DESCRIPTION/TIMELINE]

FLESH OUT: And we're introing new interventions to battle the mindset and paperwork and overwhelm of being in college. These include improving advisement/mentoring – mindset interventions, Low-cost reminders to help stay on top of academic career – text messages, emails, helping kids reapply for FAFSA.

The night ends, the sun rises, and it's 8 a.m. the next day. A college senior grabs her buzzing phone off the kitchen table. It's lighting up with text messages from her mother, her single shepherd, the manager at the internship she just finished – and all the messages are variations on “Go get ‘em!”

She smiles and puts the phone in her purse, then turns to face her reflection in a mirror. She smooths her lapels, takes a deep breath, and catches the elevator right before the doors close. She's on the way out the door for a job interview.

That isn't, of course where the story ends. We hope, of course, that our student gets that job. But we know if she doesn't, she's got the resilience and fortitude to go on another interview, and another after that. We've done right by her by instilling not just the knowledge she needs, but the tools, confidence and belief in herself to share that knowledge with the world, seize opportunities, and achieve success. That's how education in New York City has to work.

In other words: we must and will show each of our kids we believe in their ability to excel. . .

And give them the opportunity to show us we're right.

OPEN QUESTIONS:

- Are we committing to increase the number of CTE programs?
 - CTE students are more likely to graduate high school than their non CTE student counterparts – and have better outcomes for young male students of color
- Where to put accountability piece?:
 - Be accountable for the journey and the destination.
 - Schools are accountable to us not just for test scores and grad rates, but for the rigorous instruction, collaborative teachers, supportive environments, strong family-community ties, effective school leaders, and trust that improve those scores and rates.
 - We—City leaders, school leaders, teachers, parents—are all accountable to our students.
 - We (gov't) are accountable to New Yorkers for our schools' overall successes and difficulties alike.
 - We are giving more information for parents and all NYers on how schools are doing, where they need help, what that help looks like.

I'd like to propose that we offer to include charter schools in our central school enrollment system. So, for families, entering a charter lottery would be exactly as easy as applying for their district school. They would not have to go through a separate process as they do now. They would list 12 choices of elementary school in preference order, including both district and charter, and would be matched with the school they ranked the highest that has a seat for them.

It's a nice "tip of the cap." It also allows us to settle, once and for all, the question of whether the charters are operating with any selection bias, because all families would use exactly the same admissions process. Equity. One system. Etc.

This makes a ton of sense. Wish I'd thought of it.

One idea would be to highlight what a good charter school is doing in the "test model" sense (which is what charters were always supposed to be about anyway) - and demonstrate how we're replicating that/scaling it for traditional public schools... Maybe a way to highlight community schools? Or the second grade reading coach piece?

NYC schools chancellor promises better relationship with charters

DAILY NEWS - Caitlin Nolan and Ben Chapman - August 31, 2015

City schools boss Carmen Fariña promised a better relationship with the city's charter schools on a Monday back-to-school tour.

Traditional public schools start class Sept. 9, but many of the city's 207 charters schools have already begun, including the two Fariña visited with New York City Charter School Center CEO James Merriman.

The Chancellor's visits to Girls Prep Charter School of the Bronx and Growing Up Green Charter School in Queens were a stark contrast from the start of school last year, when the de Blasio administration went to war with the city's largest charter network over its use of public classrooms.

Fariña promised more collaboration and less conflict with the privately run, publicly funded schools.

"There will be a lot of this, this year," Fariña said. "A lot of cooperation and a lot of visiting each other's schools because we have a lot to learn from each other."

Merriman praised Fariña's symbolic visit.

"I think it's great," he said. "The Chancellor has visited a lot of charter schools and I think it sends a great signal."

Not totally done yet but since time is short want to give you this to get head start on charters insertion. I still have to do small-to-medium updates on College Visits for All, Algebra for All, and work in the accountability and Framework for great schools stuff. This has changes tracked in case you want to see but you can also just accept all.

For ease of version control, please track your changes too! Thanks.

Education Vision 2015: Updated ~~August 31~~September 8, 2015, 2015

Equity and Excellence: Every Student, Every Day, Every Step of the Way

Last Wednesday, 1.1 million children put another New York City summer behind them and started the school year.

Could you feel that tidal wave of emotion crash over the whole City, as it always does on that first day? So much joy, excitement, trepidation abounded on sidewalks, in school hallways and lobbies, in cars and buses and trains ferrying families to school in neighborhoods from the South Bronx to the South Shore.

Chirlane and I know those emotions well. Actually, this September is the first in 17 years we haven't been among the public school parents waving goodbye at the entrance. . .swallowing an ocean of feelings as Dante or Chiara walked away into the school year.

We know that families of every kind, in all our city's neighborhoods, share these first-day feelings. But, for many, the common experience of education stops there.

Maybe, once all the parents finally left, a teacher in one school took his new charges to tour a gleaming greenhouse, while a few miles away another was forced to shuffle desks so the leaky roof overhead wouldn't drip down on students.

Maybe in one classroom, students were the first to crack open the latest edition of a classic novel; while across town, it was two students to a tattered old copy, its spine nearly broken from decades of use.

One set of kids is no more deserving of a greenhouse or a falling-apart book than any other. Each is owed the opportunity to have their future determined by hard work and unique talents, as it should be.

But too many of our children's economic futures will be defined by the economic pasts of their neighborhoods. This status quo is unacceptable, un-American, and unfaithful to the legacy and to the promise of New York City.

We all have a stake in its change. As taxpayers, we all pay for public school. As Americans, its value is entrenched in our moral DNA. We've inherited a belief so strong it's almost biological: that this land's richness and riches derive from the success of its people—and this success is available to anyone who puts in the time and the sweat to earn it. Success is not the privilege of a few, but the right of all.

Public education is mandated by law because it is how this core American value should come to life. It's obvious and it's inevitable, it's what makes this country great: our children must go to school, there will always be a school for them to go to, and that school can be a springboard to success for each child.

In other words, our schools must be built on a foundation of both equity and excellence. These principles need to operate hand in hand as the twin engines of our city's large and powerful education system.

We have so much to be proud of—there are so many schools and so many kids who express the city's commitment to equity and excellence each day. In fact, we literally have some of the best students in the country. On a national scale, New York City's children academically outperform than their counterparts in eight of the country's 10 biggest cities. Our low-income students are the highest-performing of all 10 cities. And the one city that outpaces us by a couple of measures is San Diego – a district with one-tenth the students and 5x the funding for each one. Our kids have an awe-inspiring ability to do more with less.

Comment [KB1]: Possible to verify actual proportions here?

To fully appreciate the achievements of today's educators and students, we must also take a moment to see how far we've come. . .and the hard work of our predecessors who enabled reforms in the school system that spurred much of this progress. ~~Had+The Bloomberg Administration's successful fight for -of Mayor Bloomberg not pushed for and acquired~~ Mayoral Control of the Schools paved the way for the record-breaking graduating class of 2014. XXXX graduated a few weeks ago, reflect ~~we probably would not be graduating X more high schoolers than we were ten years ago, and Y more than 20 years ago~~ —the highest graduation rate in the city's history—17,000 more than a decade ago—and the . Test scores have increased LA LA LA WHAT PROGRESS HERE OVER WHAT TIME FRAME?

The 2014 graduating class had fewest dropouts than any other since NYC started keeping records—9,000 less than a ten years ago. And—this is a less scientific but no less meaningful measure—the great majority of the city’s students and parents like their schools.

Clearly, the city is blessed with smart, hardworking, dedicated and determined children, parents, and educators. Together, they write success stories that transform lives and lift up communities.

There simply have not been enough of those success stories. And too often, those there are emanate from the same neighborhoods—neighborhoods where the school roof doesn’t leak, and the books shine like the glass of the greenhouse. Our education system has been rife with division, and students have paid the price.

The Tale of Two Cities in our schools is unacceptable. But we believe it is NOT inevitable. And we came to City Hall to undo it. [this could use more]

Our vision for the city’s public schools is anchored by a fundamental belief in our children – in every child. We won’t choose among our children who will succeed and who will not.

We believe that every student has both the right and the ability to awaken their minds to the world, to set forth on their journey with the skills, courage and confidence to reach their full potential. Every child can grow into a successful adult—ready for college, ready for life—if their education gives them the right tools.

Over the past 18 months, we have forged those tools. They are powerful instruments of equity and excellence, for our schools and for our students—every day, every step of the way.

Let there be no mistake: the “way” I speak of leads to and includes college.

I often say that education determines economic destiny more now than at any point in human history. Nowhere is that clearer than when looking at the way a life veers towards success when a person completes college. An adult with only a HS diploma is almost three times as likely to be in poverty in NYC as someone with a bachelor's degree or higher, and earns $1.1 million less over the course of a lifetime. [Source: CEO]

And our success as a 21st century global city depends on readying students for success in higher education. Our children are counting on us, but we are counting on THEM to keep New York the most competitive city in the world.

In just five years, two-thirds [65% -- NEED HARD #] of NYC jobs are projected to require some college. [Source: CEO]. For generations, our workforce has been made up of the brightest minds from all over the world, drawn like magnets to the greatest city on earth. That attraction shows no sign of letting up, nor do we want it to, in order to keep the innovative and international flavor that makes us great. But we need more talent, and we need to grow it right here at home.

So: we have set three connected goals around higher education to lift up more of our children and meet the needs of a growing, thriving city.

First, we're going to graduate more kids. Right now, 20,000 students who begin high school in New York City each year do not finish. We do not accept that. We are setting in motion changes so that ten years from now, 9,000 more students will graduate within four years. That will bring us to an 80% graduation rate by 2026. Think of it in context of the all the second graders everywhere in the city, hard at work at this moment— By 2020, 75% of our high school students will graduate within four years. That will mean an extra 5,000 graduates each year from 2020 on. OR: By 2026, 80% of our students will graduate within four years. That will mean an extra X,000 graduates each year—or more—from 2026 on. Another way to think about it: over ten percent more of all the second graders who just started school will of them will collect their high school diploma.

Comment [KB2]: Do we need to say this or is it assumed? It's a bit confusing so would like to strike unless necessary to demarcate 4 year from 6 year grads

Second, we will make more of those diplomas carry graduates to and through college. Right now, fewer than half [48%] of our high school graduates are college-ready— meaning they truly have the skills to absorb the material taught in a college course. And in nearly half of our high schools [~~41~~%?], fewer than 10% of the graduating class is actually ready for college by these standards.

Think about that for a moment. Almost half our schools essentially graduate kids who will find college frustrating, alienating, and probably “not for them” simply because they can’t understand what they are being taught in college. Their only university path would include remedial work, which adds time and expense to the college journey that many of these students just don’t have.

And in a day and age when a college degree is the ticket to a good job, a pathway to the middle class and the most important determining factor to lifelong economic security—we cannot allow this status quo to continue.

So our college readiness goal is two-fold. First of all, we will take the number of public high school graduates who are ready for college from fewer than half [48%, ~~25,735~~] to two-thirds (65%) by 2025 – fully 34,000 every year. [HOW MANY ACTUAL GRADS IS THAT?].

Formatted: Highlight

Second, we will make sure that every single high school in New York City is capable of graduating college-ready students. No longer will families worry that graduation is simply a seal of approval on the 15 years of the past, as opposed to a real promise for the future.

Excellence will not be portioned out for the lucky few. ~~All our school will be, but~~ equitably served ~~to all our schools~~ to lift up all our children.

Today I will clarify the vision of how we get there.

We are of course already hard at work, and in 18 months we’ve made some tremendous strides. We’ve planned, funded, and rolled out full-day, high-quality, universal pre-k, as well as an unprecedented expansion of after-school for middle schoolers. Test scores are up for the second consecutive year, and the first full year on our watch.

More efforts are underway than what's covered in the news, and we'll shine a light on them today. Still others you will hear about for the very first time. And as I share the work we are doing, so too will I illustrate the ideas that animate it—the ideas that underpin an equitable and excellent school system for every child.

We will start from a fundamental place: how the City works with those who teach our children. We have redefined this relationship, premised on the belief that we must work with educators, not against them. We must value their expertise and show respect for the work they do every day. We must work harder to retain our teaching talent. And, crucially, we must grow that talent by giving all our educators the training and development they need to deepen their skills.

This professional development is a cornerstone of our reforms in every grade, and something the Chancellor—who started as a rookie teacher and has had nearly every level of job in our public education system since—speaks about with particular passion. She believes that the best way to deepen teachers' skills is to spread what works—connecting the whole education system so educators can lift each other up, with veteran educators spreading the practices that spur success to fellow teachers and principals.

Our goal is to make sure there ARE more veteran educators to do this in the years ahead. So we are laying the groundwork now to create more expert teachers for the future, who will in turn pay forward the wisdom and skills they acquired from those who taught them.

Certainly, the vast majority of our educators are talented, passionate, and deeply dedicated to their students and schools. There are, however, some teachers in our schools who should be in a learning environment. And those teachers will not remain there. We fundamentally believe in making the change that's necessary to help schools succeed, and that has already driven us to remove 700+ teachers. In other cases, we will replace school leadership or transform a school itself if they cannot improve with our tailored and targeted support.

And working with our teachers, we have created several schools—PROSE Schools—that are not beholden to labor work rules, and therefore have the unique freedom to “color outside the lines.” We will take the most successful elements of these experiments in school administration and teaching and look hard at ways to bring them to other schools. . .allowing more educators to break through formerly impenetrable boundaries in the service of helping kids learn better.

- Be accountable for the journey and the destination.
 - Schools are accountable to us not just for test scores and grad rates, but for the rigorous instruction, collaborative teachers, supportive environments, strong family-community ties, effective school leaders, and trust that improve those scores and rates.
 - We—City leaders, school leaders, teachers, parents—are all accountable to our students.
 - We (gov't) are accountable to New Yorkers for our schools' overall successes and difficulties alike.
 - We are giving more information for parents and all NYers on how schools are doing, where they need help, what that help looks like.

Framework for Great Schools. If you want to say more, we can say that the new School Quality Snapshots, which will replace the report cards and the single letter grade, are coming out in October.

Of course, we know that no two schools and no two children need the same support in order to excel. The unique chemistry of every single school means that each needs a different set of supports to offer the best for its students. And each child will travel his or her own academic, social, and emotional journey. We can't, in the interest of wholesale success, sell education wholesale to all students. They're not our customers. They're our children.

That's why we have committed to going beyond academic matters to address the full slate of issues that really engineer success. The cornerstone of this is our Community Schools initiative – 130 schools across the city that support the needs of the whole child. Community Schools might provide counseling services so students have a safe place to share her struggles and successes alike. They offer free vision exams and glasses so kids can see the blackboard. They might have a food pantry so hunger doesn't distract from learning. They might offer English classes for families so parents can help kids with their homework.

And Community Schools are modeling communication and continuity within the school walls and outside them. These practices have inspired an idea that will directly connect more families across the city with the people and places that define a student's educational journey, and bring us one step closer to ending the era of families ricocheting around inside a mammoth bureaucracy.

We are piloting a program to give the children and families who need it most ~~a their own strong, supportive hand hand-to-hold, from pre-K until they graduate from high school — a “single shepherd” to guide families through~~ -guide them in the long term through the landscape of teachers and tests, to help clear the tough hurdles and celebrate strong successes, and—most of all—to chart and clarify a path to high school graduation, the educational journey.

~~Beginning~~ In one year, every single 6th through 12th grader in ~~in two of our most struggling neighborhoods and school districts—Mott Haven and Melrose in the South Bronx’s District 7, and Brownsville in Brooklyn’s District 23, every single one of the district’s XX families will~~ have their first meeting with their Personal Counselor. This will be the first of dozens of encounters between students and counselors along the journey. The Shepherd won’t simply implore studens to keep their eyes on the prize, but actually show them how to get there. have someone to guide them for the long term through the landscape of teachers and tests, someone to help clear the tough hurdles and celebrate strong successes.

Comment [LE3]: 10,459 students. Harder to calculate families (and number will be smaller) – NEED TOTALS FOR BOTH D23 AND D7, THANKS

~~In~~ In middle school, the [SHEPHERD] will develop the Student's Progress Pact, a living contract among our students, families, teachers, and school leaders. It will chart the path to success, outline how each student will reach the goal of graduating from high school, making it to college, and succeeding all the way through. It will help students and families see that no obstacle is insurmountable on the journey to graduation.

Let's imagine a few points on that journey for some of our children, across the city, over the course of their day.

We'll start first thing in the morning. It's 8am, and a four year-old is intently focused on building a tower of blocks, stacking carefully as her classmates play behind her – some singing with a teacher, some drawing early masterpieces, some gazing at beginner books. It’s a lively and alive place, filled with the sounds and colors that awaken young children to the world.

This is the critical moment where success begins. We fundamentally believe all children must start their education earlier so they are poised to reap the benefits of kindergarten – and everything that comes after.

I’ll repeat what I’ve said before: we cannot get education right if we do not get it right from the beginning. I’m very proud that last week, we started getting it right for 70,000 of our kids, who began our free, universal, high-quality pre-K. Block towers are rising all across this great city.

Around the same time, across town, a second grader rides the bus to school with a parent, proudly showing off the book the class has been reading—explaining what it’s about and which character she played in a class activity yesterday. Her parent smiles and plays along—the second grader doesn’t know that yesterday her parent and her teacher actually spoke about it on the phone. The teacher called for a few minutes just to let her know that the student did a great job, and share an update on her reading progress.

It’s nearly impossible to overemphasize the value of these kinds of interactions—both the simple phone call from teacher to parent, and that moment of sharing between child and parent. Parents are the first and last teachers of children, and must be our partners in everything we do.

That’s why we knocked on thousands of doors this summer to make sure families knew what to expect in the year ahead. It’s why we instituted an unprecedented 40 minutes of teacher time dedicated solely to connecting with parents. Maybe this is the time during which our imaginary teacher made her phone call to share this news. ~~. . .this news which is so prized -which doesn’t just mean the world to-~~ not just by the family, but ~~also~~ to all of us and all ~~the our~~ educators. :-

~~Because o~~One second grader’s proud announcement that he or she read lines in a class activity ~~is reflects one step closer to a~~ milestone of epic proportion in that child's life: literacy. Reading is the very baseline of lifelong success. It is the foundation of learning in all subjects, of course, and for academic achievement, but it's worth so much more. Reading is how our kids explore the world and learn to think about it. It makes them engaged with society and equips them with the tools to change it. Reading is the key.

And so we are introducing a reading specialist to every single elementary school in the City to ~~four new goal of XX literacy for ALL second graders.~~ help struggling readers get—and stay—on track. The conventional standard is to measure literacy at the end of 3rd grade, but our goal is to have every single second-grader reading. We want as many children as possible to walk into their third grade classroom, pick a book off the shelf, and go to town.

This may sound ambitious. But waiting till the third-grade year may be too late for some kids: a risk we are not willing to take. It's too important and the stakes are too high.

The research is in: ~~students who are not reading proficiently by the end of third grade are four times more likely to drop out of high school than proficient readers. Conversely, students above grade level for reading in third grade graduate and enroll in college at higher rates than students at or below grade level.~~

Our goal is to have every single second grader reading, and, by 2017, to make sure every parent of a K-2 child knows their kid's reading progress. We know that when parents know how their child is doing, they help their child do better.

This may sound ambitious—many other places hold 3rd-grade as their reading standard. But the research is in. Kids who can read at grade level by the time they walk into their third grade classroom for the first time do ~~[X BETTER— NEED TO QUANTIFY]~~.

Nor do weSo we don't shy away from ambitious standards that provide the foundation for success. Aiming high is one of our core principles—and simply part of who we are. New York has the most rigorous curriculum standards and administers the toughest tests in the nation. We expect everyone to embrace this aim for excellence, translate it into specific ambitions, and transform those ambitions into achievement.

And a word about how those tests fit into the broader picture. Yes, they are tough. But we treat tests as an important thing, not THE important thing. Tests only tell you that you need to improve and where that improvement is needed—not how to get it done. That’s where committed and talented teachers are necessary for success—where teachers like the one our second grader has makes all the difference.

In fact, it’s our reading specialists, together with teachers, who will measure and manage progress of our second graders—not another high-stakes test.

Let’s turn back to the world of our students. A few hours later, it’s noon, and an eighth grader is hunched over an algebra book in the library. She finally solves $A^2 + B^2 = C^2$, sits back in wonder, and glances up at the clock to see how many minutes are left till her advisory session, when she can tell her adviser how hard it was—and how it feels to finally get it.

Our student been struggling with a lot of anger, frustration, and sadness this year, and her adviser’s office has been her sanctuary. They talk for half an hour, and then the adviser sends our student home with a family permission form to participate in a big day next week: a college tour. She’ll be the first in her family to see the inside of a college classroom.

Middle school is a deeply important time. It’s when an actual vision of success as an adult—college, a career—can come into focus. . .if we show it to our students. We are going to show them, and we are going to prepare them so that every middle school student is socially, emotionally, and academically ready for high school, and exposed to college by the time they enter 9th grade.

First, College Visits for All will come to every middle school by 20XX. we are proposing a more flexible approach that allows high schools to choose 3 from a menu of programs to help kids get ready and excited for college. We will send along a brief on that. But I think for the speech you can and should say, "We will make sure every middle and high school has the resources and support they need to provide college visits for all students. Every student will go on at least two college tours in middle school – one with their school and one with a parent – and at least two additional tours in high school. Exposing students and their families to college campuses beginning in middle school will reinforce a college-going mindset, encourage earlier conversations about college going, and motivate students to work toward college readiness. And continuing those tours in high school will keep students oriented toward higher education, and support students in identifying the strongest college fit.

Second, we have zeroed in on one of the key skills that students need to stay on pace to get to college: algebra. Research shows it [WHAT ARE THE IMPROVEMENTS?], but students at lower-performing schools have been locked out of this because the schools do not offer it. But that’s in the past. The future for our kids and our city is Algebra for All. Beginning in 20XX, every school in this city will offer algebra to their students as a central part of their preparation for high school and for life. "ensuring that all children can complete 4 years of high school math by ensuring that they have the access and support they need to complete algebra no later than 9th grade." After discussing with the experts, we are concerned that a singular focus on algebra on 8th grade is unrealistic and unproductive for us.

We won’t relegate ANY of our kids to dreaming about aiming and achieving high—starting in middle school, we’ll show them. We have already committed to getting 100,000 kids internships, mentorships, and summer jobs by 2025—including our most vulnerable children in foster homes and shelter. We are doubling down on that today: every middle and high school will have a business partner [EXPLAIN WHAT THIS IS/DOES].

These middle years can also be tremendously hard for many kids, and for their families—to this day I often say I’m a Recovering Middle School Parent. All this ambition, all these skills, will take root if and only if our kids are socially and emotionally ready for these experiences, and what’s to come with the rigors of high school. And that’s not easy for a lot of our kids, who are battling tough situations at home, or among their friends, or just with the difficulties of growing up.

My wife, Chirlane, has been deeply focused on the mental health needs of our kids. She’s working with the Administration to revolutionize how we deal with mental health in this city, especially for those with the greatest need and the fewest options. You'll hear a lot more about that in the near future.

These battles can interfere with learning. And we are determined, as a City, to break down all barriers to learning so children come to school ready to succeed. We must fulfill our children's basic prerequisites to learning, accounting for mental and physical health, family stability and support, financial hurdles, and more. Community Schools are the bedrock of these efforts, and this month marks the moment when every last one of the 130 schools we have targeted completes its transformation into a Community School.

Time is passing: it's 3:30pm, and a tenth grader runs her fingers over the pages of her English Language Arts workbook. As a recent immigrant, she needs to pass the English Regents to graduate—so the school staff has created this extended learning period for her and the 15 other English Language Learners in the class. There's a little tap on her back, and our student turns to find a small folded-up piece of paper on the floor right next to her chair. (Some things never change. . . like passing notes in class.) She catches out of the corner of her eye a friend and fellow student grinning. She unfolds the note and reads: "Computer Lab before 2nd period tomorrow?"

Before we think about the computer lab tomorrow, let's think about where our students are right now. Extended learning time—an extra hour of instruction each day—is a hallmark of our 94 Renewal Schools. These 94 schools are those that have struggled the most to serve their students and families and provide a solid education to our children. So we are rolling out sweeping reforms that touch every part of those schools—transforming the classrooms and the culture to turn the tables of history for the school and its community. In addition to extra class time, Renewal Schools [XYZ DETAILS HERE OF THINGS THEY OFFER].

And it's working. [UPDATE WITH MOST RECENT STATS/STORIES OF HOW RENEWAL SCHOOLS ARE WORKING:

- Old info test scores are up in 2015 (0.6% in Math, 1.2% in English)
- Attendance - a leading indicator for academic improvements - improved year over year at 56 Renewal Schools.

Comment [LE5]: -Director of School Renewal supporting principal in charting the school's new direction
-Supplemental teacher professional development, particularly around writing strategies and STEM
- On-site physical and mental health services, including vision screening for all students
-Enhanced school libraries
-Access to new digital books
-New writing programs / curricula

- o Individual schools saw tremendous gains, such as an 8.1% improvement at Multicultural High School and a 4.6% improvement at JHS 022*

Comment [LE6]: Pick and choose your favorite stats!

For too long, we haven't even given students the chance to aim high in high school, because they haven't been offered the chance to do advanced work—a chance that we know, when taken, correlates with success. You can't shoot for the moon if there's no rocket to take you there.

That ends today. Today we offer every high schooler the chance to aim and achieve high. We are introducing AP for All: bringing Advanced Placement classes to every high school by 20XX. Students who take AP classes later excel. .

In a study of students in Texas, those who took AP courses were twice as likely to graduate college in 5 year as compared to their peers who did not, with even more significant gains in minority and low-income populations. While passing an AP exam has a stronger correlation with college success, even exposure to the material can have a lasting impact; students who sat for an AP exam and only received a score of 1-2 (of 5) graduated college at a higher rate than their peers who did not take AP exams at all. [NEED EVIDENCE/RESEARCH SOUNDBITE]

And now, back to that computer lab. Both computer equipment and Computer Science training is a novelty for many students and teachers, including those at nearly all of our Renewal Schools. Fewer than 5% of all NYC public school students have an opportunity to learn Computer Science, and those that do are clustered in just a few high-performing schools.

This is not sustainable for students or for our city, which increasingly needs more people with the computer proficiency to power all kinds of companies, from tech to finance to health to fashion. Hundreds of thousands of good jobs will be accessible to those with computer science skills, and beyond the reach of those without them.

That is why we are immensely proud to announce today the launch of Computer Science for All, which will provide a computer science education to every single public school student within ten years through an $81 million public-private partnership between the City of New York and CSNYC.

On state assessments, Renewal Schools saw modest gains in ELA (1.2%) and math (0.6%)

- Percent proficient improved at every grade level for ELA
- Percent proficient improved at every grade level for math, except 8th grade There was also a citywide decline in 8th grade
- Biggest gains in 3rd grade – 3.5% increase in ELA, 4.3% increase in math
- 26 schools had score increases in both subjects, 25 in just one, and 12 had a decrease in both subjects

Graduation is projected to have a small uptick

- Preliminary data will be available this fall Official data will be available in December

72 schools had an increase in attendance (vs. last year)

- Overall, Renewal School attendance increased 1.3%
- Percent of chronically absent students decreased 3.0%

Suspensions decreased at all grade levels in Renewal Schools, and at a more dramatic rate than citywide

- Grades K-8 suspensions decreased 54.9% (vs. a 24.8% decrease citywide)
- Grades 9-12 suspensions decreased 39.2% (vs. a 12.2% decrease citywide)

Dangerous incidents decreased

- 17 schools had a Persistently Dangerous designation in 2014-15 Just 8 retained their designation for 2015-16

Teachers are more confident in the direction of their schools

- Average teacher attendance improved in 60 schools
- 66% of teachers wouldn't want to work in any other school (vs. 58% last year)
- 71% of teachers would recommend this school to parents (vs. 62% last year)

Renewal School parents are engaging with their child's school

- 68% of parents communicated with their child's teacher at least once a month
- 52% of parents had an in-person parent-teacher conference at least once a month
- 27% of parents volunteered to support their child's school at least once a month

We are on track to transition all Renewal Schools to Community Schools

- All 94 schools have been matched with a Community Based Organization (CBO)
- 72 of 94 Community School Directors have been hired
- 31,197 of 38,000 homes visited through door-knocking campaign

This is the largest effort to expand computer science in the country. It will make New York the first-largest school district in the nation to provide computer science to every student—and the first City to invest in the future of its students and its economy in this pioneering way.

Now it's 5pm. A recent graduate comes home from her summer job. She's done it—the days and nights of hard work, struggles and ultimately victories have earned her admission to college [CUNY?]. Money is tight for her, as it is for so many New Yorkers. So maybe she's working at a fast food restaurant, or cleaning hotel rooms to get by. She arrives home to a letter from her university. It's her fall semester reading list. Total price of textbooks: $600. She freezes.

Each year, 20,000 of the City's high school graduates do not enter college. They fall victim to the phenomenon of "summer melt," where their ability or confidence to begin college in September simply melts away due to unexpected or onerous expenses, or paperwork, or simply uncertainty about how it could all possibly work.

But WE are here to declare that neither finances, fear, nor the unfamiliar will be a barrier to education and a life of success for our children. And our work to break down these barriers will not stop at high school graduation.

We are giving our students every support they need – including financial help for the things both in plain sight and hiding in the shadows, like textbooks.

We're doubling down on mentoring and advisement. [YMI, HS counselors? NEED MORE INFO ON COLLEGE-GOING CULTURE AND MINDSET INTERVENTIONS]. Readiness isn't just an academic state of mind or set of skills.

Comment [LE7]: More info coming soon.

And we are establishing for every child a college savings account, putting aside $50 for every child put aside the moment they enter our education system. [DETAILS]. This would transform the experience of our student confronted with hundreds of dollars in books. She wouldn't be cowed. She wouldn't freeze. She'd know it's there, and she's draw on her savings account and buy her books.

The sun is behind the skyline and it's 8:30pm. After a morning spent at a part-time job and classes all afternoon and into the evening, a college sophomore enters the subway and carefully puts away her Metrocard. At the right stop, she runs up the stairs and greets her study group inside a public library. They've ridden the train stations all over the City in order to be able to meet in one place and study for the next day's exam.

Right now, 17,000 students of our students who begin college do not finish—an unacceptable situation. Sometimes it's because of thing as basic as not being able to afford transportation to class.

Our student got her Metrocard through a CUNY program called ASAP. ASAP kids are given the support they need to succeed in this and every dimension. They receive Metrocard to get to class. They are given a designated cohort of students to travel with through the four years so peers can lift each other up.

We know it works: [EVIDENCE]. And it is now a national model, replicated in places like [XYZ].

That's why are investing to enroll 7 times as many students over the next four years. [3500 enrolled in FY15 vs 25,000 enrolled in FY19]. [MORE METRICS/DESCRIPTION/TIMELINE]

| FLESH OUT: And we're introducing new interventions to battle the mindset and paperwork and overwhelm of being in college. These include improving advisement/mentoring – mindset interventions, Low-cost reminders to help stay on top of academic career – text messages, emails, helping kids reapply for FAFSA.

The night ends, the sun rises, and it's 8 a.m. the next day. A college senior grabs her buzzing phone off the kitchen table. It's lighting up with text messages from her mother, her single shepherd, the manager at the internship she just finished – and all the messages are variations on “Go get ‘em!”

She smiles and puts the phone in her purse, then turns to face her reflection in a mirror. She smooths her lapels, takes a deep breath, and catches the elevator right before the doors close. She's on the way out the door for a job interview.

That isn't, of course where the story ends. We hope, of course, that our student gets that job. But we know if she doesn't, she's got the resilience and fortitude to go on another interview, and another after that. We've done right by her by instilling not just the knowledge she needs, but the tools, confidence and belief in herself to share that knowledge with the world, seize opportunities, and achieve success. That's how education in New York City has to work.

In other words: we must and will show each of our kids we believe in their ability to excel. . .

And give them the opportunity to show us we're right.

OPEN QUESTIONS:

- Are we committing to increase the number of CTE programs?
 - CTE students are more likely to graduate high school than their non CTE student counterparts – and have better outcomes for young male students of color
- ~~Where to put accountability piece?:~~
 - ~~Be accountable for the journey and the destination.~~
 - ~~Schools are accountable to us not just for test scores and grad rates, but for the rigorous instruction, collaborative teachers, supportive environments, strong family community ties, effective school leaders, and trust that improve those scores and rates.~~
 - ~~We – City leaders, school leaders, teachers, parents – are all accountable to our students.~~
 - ~~We (gov't) are accountable to New Yorkers for our schools' overall successes and difficulties alike.~~

- ~~We are giving more information for parents and all NYers on how schools are doing, where they need help, what that help looks like.~~

Almost done and hit a few Qs along the way. . .

- Total # of 2014 grads is not available yet, right?
- District 23 and 7 neighborhoods? – Mott Haven, Melrose, Brownsville?
- Other illustrative inequity ideas to replace greenhouse? I get your comment JW, but we need something visual and I'm accepting all suggestions. . .
- What are we doing with the following:
 - "By 2017, we will make sure every parent of a K-2 child knows their kid's reading progress. We know that when parents know how their child is doing, they help their child do better."
 - Business partners
 - Progress Pact

Thanks for sending this.

I'm a little concerned that this draft still has a lot of the same holes and questions as the one we looked at a week ago, despite the fact that Emmy and Karin and team have sent over a lot of suggestions and answers. I think it is important that someone find the time to incorporate the material we provided, including Emmy's comments, which I have reattached here. Otherwise it will seem tomorrow like we have made much less progress than we have.

On the major initiatives, let me summarize a few of the main changes here:

~~* On second grade reading, we cannot propose an outcome goal because we don't have a way of measuring this yet. Instead, we will propose an input goal, which is that every elementary school will have a reading specialist to help struggling readers get and stay on track. We can also say that we will develop a way to measure and manage this that relies on teachers assessments, and not the introduction of another high stakes test in 2nd grade.~~

~~* On the "single shepherd," we are now proposing to pilot this in two districts (7 in the South Bronx and 23 in Central Brooklyn) but only for grades 6-12. I strongly urge a new name for this, but I think others will have to convince the boss on this.~~

~~* Instead of College Visits for All, we are proposing a more flexible approach that allows high schools to choose 3 from a menu of programs to help kids get ready and excited for college. We will send along a brief on that. But I think for the speech you can and should say, "We will make sure every middle and high school has the resources and support they need to provide college visits for all students.~~

* We want to describe Algebra for All as "ensuring that all children can complete 4 years of high school math by ensuring that they have the access and support they need to complete algebra no later than 9th grade." After discussing with the experts, we are concerned that a singular focus on algebra on 8th grade is unrealistic and unproductive for us.

* We are not clear what is happening with the CUNY ASAP proposal. We should decide before this next meeting whether it remains in this speech or is held for a separate event on postsecondary persistence and graduation.

Other thoughts on this draft:

~~* The tagline "Every day, every step of the way" is fine, but Carmen recently introduced "Every student, every day" as her "mantra" and it accomplishes a lot of the same. In fact, I like its emphasis on focusing on one student at a time. Maybe good to have the two system leaders using the same line. You could also combine them.~~

~~* I don't think the inequities on p. 1 are the right ones. DOE actually does a pretty good job of making sure facilities and textbooks are equitable. We have a renewal school with a~~ snazzy new greenhouse, for example, and Fair Student Funding has helped a lot. We should focus on the real inequity—that fewer students at some schools gain the skills they need to succeed.

* Along the same lines, I'd like to say something about how poverty and lack of opportunity for families contributes to that inequity. The administration is trying to address it on all fronts, and all the efforts reinforce one another.

* I'm nervous about the use of NAEP scores. Karin, could you share the sources on that? I'm sure they're right, I just want to understand them better.

~~* We are no longer the first city to offer computer science for all, as San Francisco recently beat us to the punch, but we are by far the biggest.~~

* I think the accountability language at the end of the current draft belongs somewhere in pp. 5-6 where you refer to our overall approach. It is important that somewhere he mention the framework or the elements of the framework, or it sounds like he isn't paying attention to the main way we are measuring school progress. One short reference will do it. If you want to say more, we can say that the new School Quality Snapshots, which will replace the report cards and the single letter grade, are coming out in October.

Can we see a new turn tonight or early tomorrow am?

Thanks,

Josh

Sorry for the delay. Been driving around Maine trying to find reliable wifi !

This reflects a lot of what we know about several of the new things the team has been working on, but there are still some things that could be filled in so policy folks, please do a scan to plug in dates/investment #s/anything else it makes sense to include. Some placeholders are here and others you can add (e.g. By 20XX, an investment of $YY million will bring AP classes to all high schools. . .). Andie needs any of these additions by 3 p.m. for printing.

This also reflects the Mayor's miscellaneous notes about things like tipping our hat to MRB, etc.

JDC -- I will email you about a few things under separate cover.

Thanks,

Education Vision 2015: Updated August 31, 2015

Equity and Excellence: Every Day, Every Step of the Way

Last Wednesday, 1.1 million children put another New York City summer behind them and started the school year.

Could you feel that tidal wave of emotion crash over the whole City, as it always does on that first day? So much joy, excitement, trepidation abounded on sidewalks, in school hallways and lobbies, in cars and buses and trains ferrying families to school in neighborhoods from the South Bronx to the South Shore.

Chirlane and I know those emotions well. Actually, this September is the first in 17 years we haven't been among the public school parents waving goodbye at the entrance. . .swallowing an ocean of feelings as Dante or Chiara walked away into the school year.

We know that families of every kind, in all our city's neighborhoods, share these first-day feelings. But, for many, the common experience of education stops there.

Maybe, once all the parents finally left, a teacher in one school took his new charges to tour a gleaming greenhouse, while a few miles away another was forced to shuffle desks so the leaky roof overhead wouldn't drip down on students.

Maybe in one classroom, students were the first to crack open the latest edition of a classic novel; while across town, it was two students to a tattered old copy, its spine nearly broken from decades of use.

One set of kids is no more deserving of a greenhouse or a falling-apart book than any other. Each is owed the opportunity to have their future determined by hard work and unique talents, as it should be.

But too many of our children's economic futures will be defined by the economic pasts of their neighborhoods. This status quo is unacceptable, un-American, and unfaithful to the legacy and to the promise of New York City.

We all have a stake in its change. As taxpayers, we all pay for public school. As Americans, its value is entrenched in our moral DNA. We've inherited a belief so strong it's almost biological: that this land's richness and riches derive from the success of its people—and this success is available to anyone who puts in the time and the sweat to earn it. Success is not the privilege of a few, but the right of all.

Public education is mandated by law because it is how this core American value should come to life. It's obvious and it's inevitable, it's what makes this country great: our children must go to school, there will always be a school for them to go to, and that school can be a springboard to success for each child.

In other words, our schools must be built on a foundation of both equity and excellence. These principles need to operate hand in hand as the twin engines of our city's large and powerful education system.

We have so much to be proud of—there are so many schools and so many kids who express the city's commitment to equity and excellence each day. In fact, we literally have some of the best students in the country. On a national scale, New York City's children academically outperform than their counterparts in eight of the country's 10 biggest cities. Our low-income students are the highest-performing of all 10 cities. And the one city that outpaces us by a couple of measures is San Diego – a district with one-tenth the students and 5x the funding for each one. Our kids have an awe-inspiring ability to do more with less.

To fully appreciate the achievements of today's educators and students, we must also take a moment to see how far we've come. . .and the hard work of our predecessors who enabled reforms in the school system that spurred much of this progress. Had the Administration of Mayor Bloomberg not pushed for and acquired Mayoral Control of the Schools, we probably would not be graduating X more high schoolers than we were ten years ago, and Y more than 20 years ago—the highest graduation rate in the city's history. Test scores have increased LA LA LA WHAT PROGRESS HERE OVER WHAT TIME FRAME?.

Comment [LE1]: 17,000 more students graduated in 2014 than in 2005. We do not have graduation data per the same methodology prior to the class of 2001

Comment [LE2]: Test scores haven actually decreased as the tests have become more rigorous. See p. 4 in this deck- http://schools.nyc.gov/NR/rdonlyres/C7E210CA-F686-4805-BEA6-EDD91F76E58B/185429/2015MathELAPublicDeck81215_SITE.pdf

The 2014 graduating class had fewer dropouts than any other since NYC started keeping records. And—this is a less scientific but no less meaningful measure—the great majority of the city’s students and parents like their schools.

Comment [LE3]: We had 7300 dropouts from the class of 2010 (2014 graduation) vs. 16,300 from the class of 2001 (2005 graduation)

Clearly, the city is blessed with smart, hardworking, dedicated and determined children, parents, and educators. Together, they write success stories that transform lives and lift up communities.

There simply have not been enough of those success stories. And too often, those there are emanate from the same neighborhoods—neighborhoods where the school roof doesn’t leak, and the books shine like the glass of the greenhouse. Our education system has been rife with division, and students have paid the price.

The Tale of Two Cities in our schools is unacceptable. But we believe it is NOT inevitable. And we came to City Hall to undo it. [this could use more]

Our vision for the city’s public schools is anchored by a fundamental belief in our children – in every child. We won’t choose among our children who will succeed and who will not.

We believe that every student has both the right and the ability to awaken their minds to the world, to set forth on their journey with the skills, courage and confidence to reach their full potential. Every child can grow into a successful adult—ready for college, ready for life—if their education gives them the right tools.

Over the past 18 months, we have forged those tools. They are powerful instruments of equity and excellence, for our schools and for our students—every day, every step of the way.

Let there be no mistake: the “way” I speak of leads to and includes college.

I often say that education determines economic destiny more now than at any point in human history. Nowhere is that clearer than when looking at the way a life veers towards success when a person completes college. An adult with only a HS diploma is almost three times as likely to be in poverty in NYC as someone with a bachelor's degree or higher, and earns $1.1 million less over the course of a lifetime. [Source: CEO]

And our success as a 21st century global city depends on readying students for success in higher education. Our children are counting on us, but we are counting on THEM to keep New York the most competitive city in the world.

In just five years, two-thirds [65% -- NEED HARD #] of NYC jobs are projected to require some college. [Source: CEO]. For generations, our workforce has been made up of the brightest minds from all over the world, drawn like magnets to the greatest city on earth. That attraction shows no sign of letting up, nor do we want it to, in order to keep the innovative and international flavor that makes us great. But we need more talent, and we need to grow it right here at home

So: we have set three connected goals around higher education to lift up more of our children and meet the needs of a growing, thriving city.

First, we're going to graduate more kids. Right now, 20,000 students who begin high school in New York City each year do not finish. By 2020, 75% of our high school students will graduate within four years. That will mean an extra 5,000 graduates each year from 2020 on. OR: By 2026, 80% of our students will graduate within four years. That will mean an extra X,000 graduates each year—or more—from 2026 on. Another way to think about it: over ten percent more of all the second graders who just started school will collect their high school diploma.

Comment [LE4]: 8,740. Can call it 9,000 to sound rounder

Second, we will make more of those diplomas carry graduates to and through college. Right now, fewer than half [48%] of our high school graduates are college-ready— meaning they truly have the skills to absorb the material taught in a college course. And in nearly half of our high schools [X%?], fewer than 10% of the graduating class is actually ready for college by these standards.

Comment [LE5]: 41% of schools. Need to calculate what percent of kids that is since some of these schools have very small cohorts.

Think about that for a moment. Almost half our schools essentially graduate kids who will find college frustrating, alienating, and probably “not for them” simply because they can't understand what they are being taught in college. Their only university path would include remedial work, which adds time and expense to the college journey that many of these students just don't have.

And in a day and age when a college degree is the ticket to a good job, a pathway to the middle class and the most important determining factor to lifelong economic security—we cannot allow this status quo to continue.

So our college readiness goal is two-fold. First of all, we will take the number of public high school graduates who are ready for college from fewer than half [48%] to two-thirds (65%) by 2025 [HOW MANY ACTUAL GRADS IS THAT?].

Comment [LE6] : Today it's 25,735. 65% would take us up to 34,000 kids. Need to double check this data before it's speech ready as there are internal discrepancies

Second, we will make sure that every single high school in New York City is capable of graduating college-ready students. No longer will families worry that graduation is simply a seal of approval on the 15 years of the past, as opposed to a real promise for the future.

Excellence will not be portioned out for the lucky few, but equitably served to all our schools to lift up all our children.

Today I will clarify the vision of how we get there.

We are of course already hard at work, and in 18 months we've made some tremendous strides. We've planned, funded, and rolled out full-day, high-quality, universal pre-k, as well as an unprecedented expansion of after-school for middle schoolers. Test scores are up for the second consecutive year, and the first full year on our watch.

More efforts are underway than what's covered in the news, and we'll shine a light on them today. Still others you will hear about for the very first time. And as I share the work we are doing, so too will I illustrate the ideas that animate it—the ideas that underpin an equitable and excellent school system for every child.

We will start from a fundamental place: how the City works with those who teach our children. We have redefined this relationship, premised on the belief that we must work with educators, not against them. We must value their expertise and show respect for the work they do every day. We must work harder to retain our teaching talent. And, crucially, we must grow that talent by giving all our educators the training and development they need to deepen their skills.

This professional development is a cornerstone of our reforms in every grade, and something the Chancellor—who started as a rookie teacher and has had nearly every level of job in our public education system since—speaks about with particular passion. She believes that the best way to deepen teachers’ skills is to spread what works—connecting the whole education system so educators can lift each other up, with veteran educators spreading the practices that spur success to fellow teachers and principals.

Our goal is to make sure there ARE more veteran educators to do this in the years ahead. So we are laying the groundwork now to create more expert teachers for the future, who will in turn pay forward the wisdom and skills they acquired from those who taught them.

Certainly, the vast majority of our educators are talented, passionate, and deeply dedicated to their students and schools. There are, however, some teachers in our schools who should be in a learning environment. And those teachers will not remain there. We fundamentally believe in making the change that’s necessary to help schools succeed, and that has already driven us to remove 700+ teachers. In other cases, we will replace school leadership or transform a school itself if they cannot improve with our tailored and targeted support.

And working with our teachers, we have created several schools—PROSE Schools—that are not beholden to labor work rules, and therefore have the unique freedom to “color outside the lines.” We will take the most successful elements of these experiments in school administration and teaching and look hard at ways to bring them to other schools. . .allowing more educators to break through formerly impenetrable boundaries in the service of helping kids learn better.

Of course, we know that no two schools and no two children need the same support in order to excel. The unique chemistry of every single school means that each needs a different set of supports to offer the best for its students.

And each child will travel his or her own academic, social, and emotional journey. We can't, in the interest of wholesale success, sell education wholesale to all students. They're not our customers. They're our children.

That's why we have committed to going beyond academic matters to address the full slate of issues that really engineer success. The cornerstone of this is our Community Schools initiative – 130 schools across the city that support the needs of the whole child. Community Schools might provide counseling services so students have a safe place to share her struggles and successes alike. They offer free vision exams and glasses so kids can see the blackboard. They might have a food pantry so hunger doesn't distract from learning. They might offer English classes for families so parents can help kids with their homework.

And Community Schools are modeling communication and continuity within the school walls and outside them. These practices have inspired an idea that will directly connect more families across the city with the people and places that define a student's educational journey, and bring us one step closer to ending the era of families ricocheting around inside a mammoth bureaucracy.

We are piloting a program to give children and families who need it most a hand to hold from pre-K until they graduate from high school—a “single shepherd” to guide families through the educational journey. Beginning in one year in Brownsville, every single one of the district's XX families will have someone to guide them for the long term through the landscape of teachers and tests, someone to help clear the tough hurdles and celebrate strong successes.

Comment [LE7]: 10,459 students. Harder to calculate families (and number will be smaller)

In middle school, the [SHEPHERD] will develop the Student's Progress Pact, a living contract among our students, families, teachers, and school leaders. It will outline how each student will reach the goal of graduating from high school, making it to college, and succeeding all the way through.

Comment [LE8]: If we view this as an extension of today's guidance model, why not call it a counselor?

Let's imagine a few points on that journey for some of our children, across the city, over the course of their day.

We'll start first thing in the morning. It's 8am, and a four year-old is intently focused on building a tower of blocks, stacking carefully as her classmates play behind her – some singing with a teacher, some drawing early masterpieces, some gazing at beginner books. It's a lively and alive place, filled with the sounds and colors that awaken young children to the world.

This is the critical moment where success begins. We fundamentally believe all children must start their education earlier so they are poised to reap the benefits of kindergarten – and everything that comes after.

I'll repeat what I've said before: we cannot get education right if we do not get it right from the beginning. I'm very proud that last week, we started getting it right for 70,000 of our kids, who began our free, universal, high-quality pre-K. Block towers are rising all across this great city.

Around the same time, across town, a second grader rides the bus to school with a parent, proudly showing off the book the class has been reading—explaining what it's about and which character she played in a class activity yesterday. Her parent smiles and plays along—the second grader doesn't know that yesterday her parent and her teacher actually spoke about it on the phone. The teacher called for a few minutes just to let her know that the student did a great job, and share an update on her reading progress.

It's nearly impossible to overemphasize the value of these kinds of interactions—both the simple phone call from teacher to parent, and that moment of sharing between child and parent. Parents are the first and last teachers of children, and must be our partners in everything we do.

That's why we knocked on thousands of doors this summer to make sure families knew what to expect in the year ahead. It's why we instituted an unprecedented 40 minutes of teacher time dedicated solely to connecting with parents. Maybe this is the time during which our imaginary teacher made her phone call to share this news which doesn't just mean the world to the family, but also to all of us and all the educators. . .

Because one second grader’s proud announcement that he or she read lines in a class activity is one step closer to [our new goal of XX literacy for ALL second graders. Our goal is to have every single second grader reading, and, by 2017, to make sure every parent of a K-2 child knows their kid’s reading progress. We know that when parents know how their child is doing, they help their child do better.

Comment [LE9]: Our new goal of universal literacy for second graders, with an interim goal of 60% by 2025?

Comment [KB10]: Getting more specificity/clarity from DOE

This may sound ambitious—many other places hold 3rd grade as their reading standard. But the research is in. Kids who can read at grade level by the time they walk into their third grade classroom for the first time do [X BETTER – NEED TO QUANTIFY].

Comment [LE11]: Pick your fact:

Literacy at the end of third grade determines students’ ability to learn across all content areas; up to half of printed fourth grade curricula are incomprehensible to children who leave third grade below reading level

The foundational literacy skills developed in the early years are critical to the continued development of reading abilities: Third-grade reading level is a significant predictor of eighth-grade reading level, and three quarters of students who are poor readers in third grade will remain poor readers in high school. Students who are not reading proficiently by the end of third grade are four times more likely to drop out of high school than proficient readers. Conversely, students above grade level for reading in third grade graduate and enroll in college at higher rates than students at or below grade level.

Nor do we shy away from ambitious standards. Aiming high is one of our core principles—and simply part of who we are. New York has the most rigorous curriculum standards and administers the toughest tests in the nation. We expect everyone to embrace this aim for excellence, translate it into specific ambitions, and transform those ambitions into achievement.

And a word about how those tests fit into the broader picture. Yes, they are tough. But we treat tests as an important thing, not THE important thing. Tests only tell you that you need to improve and where that improvement is needed—not how to get it done. That’s where committed and talented teachers are necessary for success—where teachers like the one our second grader has makes all the difference.

A few hours later, it’s noon, and an eighth grader is hunched over an algebra book in the library. She finally solves $A^2 + B^2 = C^2$, sits back in wonder, and glances up at the clock to see how many minutes are left till her advisory session, when she can tell her adviser how hard it was—and how it feels to finally get it.

Our student been struggling with a lot of anger, frustration, and sadness this year, and her adviser’s office has been her sanctuary. They talk for half an hour, and then the adviser sends our student home with a family permission form to participate in a big day next week: a college tour. She'll be the first in her family to see the inside of a college classroom.

Middle school is a deeply important time. It's when an actual vision of success as an adult—college, a career—can come into focus. . .if we show it to our students. We are going to show them, and we are going to prepare them so that every middle school student is socially, emotionally, and academically ready for high school, and exposed to college by the time they enter 9th grade.

First, College Visits for All will come to every middle school by 20XX.

[DETAILS]

Second, we have zeroed in on one of the key skills that students need to stay on pace to get to college: algebra. Research shows it [WHAT ARE THE IMPROVEMENTS?], but students at lower-performing schools have been locked out of this because the schools do not offer it. But that's in the past. The future for our kids and our city is Algebra for All. Beginning in 20XX, every school in this city will offer algebra to their students as a central part of their preparation for high school and for life.

We won't relegate ANY of our kids to dreaming about aiming and achieving high—starting in middle school, we'll show them. We have already committed to getting 100,000 kids internships, mentorships, and summer jobs by 2025—including our most vulnerable children in foster homes and shelter. We are doubling down on that today: every middle and high school will have a business partner [EXPLAIN WHAT THIS IS/DOES].

These middle years can also be tremendously hard for many kids, and for their families—to this day I often say I'm a Recovering Middle School Parent. All this ambition, all these skills, will take root if and only if our kids are socially and emotionally ready for these experiences, and what's to come with the rigors of high school. And that's not easy for a lot of our kids, who are battling tough situations at home, or among their friends, or just with the difficulties of growing up.

Comment [LE12]: Every student will go on at least two college tours in middle school – one with their school and one with a parent – and at least two additional tours in high school. Exposing students and their families to college campuses beginning in middle school will reinforce a college-going mindset, encourage earlier conversations about college going, and motivate students to work toward college readiness. And continuing those tours in high school will keep students oriented toward higher education, and support students in identifying the strongest college fit.

My wife, Chirlane, has been deeply focused on the mental health needs of our kids. She's working with the Administration to revolutionize how we deal with mental health in this city, especially for those with the greatest need and the fewest options. You'll hear a lot more about that in the near future.

These battles can interfere with learning. And we are determined, as a City, to break down all barriers to learning so children come to school ready to succeed. We must fulfill our children's basic prerequisites to learning, accounting for mental and physical health, family stability and support, financial hurdles, and more. Community Schools are the bedrock of these efforts, and this month marks the moment when every last one of the 130 schools we have targeted completes its transformation into a Community School.

Time is passing: it's 3:30pm, and a tenth grader runs her fingers over the pages of her English Language Arts workbook. As a recent immigrant, she needs to pass the English Regents to graduate—so the school staff has created this extended learning period for her and the 15 other English Language Learners in the class. There's a little tap on her back, and our student turns to find a small folded-up piece of paper on the floor right next to her chair. (Some things never change. . .like passing notes in class.) She catches out of the corner of her eye a friend and fellow student grinning. She unfolds the note and reads: "Computer Lab before 2nd period tomorrow?"

Before we think about the computer lab tomorrow, let's think about where our students are right now. Extended learning time—an extra hour of instruction each day—is a hallmark of our 94 Renewal Schools. These 94 schools are those that have struggled the most to serve their students and families and provide a solid education to our children. So we are rolling out sweeping reforms that touch every part of those schools—transforming the classrooms and the culture to turn the tables of history for the school and its community. In addition to extra class time, Renewal Schools [XYZ DETAILS HERE OF THINGS THEY OFFER].

And it's working. [UPDATE WITH MOST RECENT STATS/STORIES OF HOW RENEWAL SCHOOLS ARE WORKING:

- Old info test scores are up in 2015 (0.6% in Math, 1.2% in English)

Comment [LE13]: -Director of School Renewal supporting principal in charting the school's new direction
-Supplemental teacher professional development, particularly around writing strategies and STEM
- On-site physical and mental health services, including vision screening for all students
-Enhanced school libraries
-Access to new digital books
-New writing programs / curricula

- Attendance - a leading indicator for academic improvements - improved year over year at 56 Renewal Schools.
 - Individual schools saw tremendous gains, such as an 8.1% improvement at Multicultural High School and a 4.6% improvement at JHS 022*

Comment [LE14]: Pick and choose your favorite stats!

On state assessments, Renewal Schools saw modest gains in ELA (1.2%) and math (0.6%)

- Percent proficient improved at every grade level for ELA
- Percent proficient improved at every grade level for math, except 8th grade There was also a citywide decline in 8th grade
- Biggest gains in 3rd grade – 3.5% increase in ELA, 4.3% increase in math
- 26 schools had score increases in both subjects, 25 in just one, and 12 had a decrease in both subjects

Graduation is projected to have a small uptick

- Preliminary data will be available this fall Official data will be available in December
- 72 schools had an increase in attendance (vs. last year)

- Overall, Renewal School attendance increased 1.3%
- Percent of chronically absent students decreased 3.0%

Suspensions decreased at all grade levels in Renewal Schools, and at a more dramatic rate than citywide

- Grades K-8 suspensions decreased 54.9% (vs a 24.8% decrease citywide)
- Grades 9-12 suspensions decreased 39.2% (vs a 12.2% decrease citywide)

Dangerous incidents decreased

- 17 schools had a Persistently Dangerous designation in 2014-15 Just 8 retained their designation for 2015-16

Teachers are more confident in the direction of their schools

- Average teacher attendance improved in 60 schools
- 66% of teachers wouldn't want to work in any other school (vs 58% last year)
- 71% of teachers would recommend this school to parents (vs 62% last year)

Renewal School parents are engaging with their child's school

Comment [LE15]: In a study of students in Texas, those who took AP courses were twice as likely to graduate college in 5 year as compared to their peers who did not, with even more significant gains in minority and low-income populations. While passing an AP exam has a stronger correlation with college success, even exposure to the material can have a lasting impact; students who sat for an AP exam and only received a score of 1-2 (of 5) graduated college at a higher rate than their peers who did not take AP exams at all.

For too long, we haven't even given students the chance to aim high in high school, because they haven't been offered the chance to do advanced work—a chance that we know, when taken, correlates with success. You can't shoot for the moon if there's no rocket to take you there.

That ends today. Today we offer every high schooler the chance to aim and achieve high. We are introducing AP for All: bringing Advanced Placement classes to every high school by 20XX. Students who take AP classes later excel. . [NEED EVIDENCE/RESEARCH SOUNDBITE].

And now, back to that computer lab. Both computer equipment and Computer Science training is a novelty for many students and teachers, including those at nearly all of our Renewal Schools. Fewer than 5% of all NYC public school students have an opportunity to learn Computer Science, and those that do are clustered in just a few high-performing schools.

This is not sustainable for students or for our city, which increasingly needs more people with the computer proficiency to power all kinds of companies, from tech to finance to health to fashion. Hundreds of thousands of good jobs will be accessible to those with computer science skills, and beyond the reach of those without them.

That is why we are immensely proud to announce today the launch of Computer Science for All, which will provide a computer science education to every single public school student within ten years through an $81 million public-private partnership between the City of New York and CSNYC.

This is the largest effort to expand computer science in the country. It will make New York the first school district in the nation to provide computer science to every student—and the first City to invest in the future of its students and its economy in this pioneering way.

Now it's 5pm. A recent graduate comes home from her summer job. She's done it—the days and nights of hard work, struggles and ultimately victories have earned her admission to college [CUNY?]. Money is tight for her, as it is for so many New Yorkers. So maybe she's working at a fast food restaurant, or cleaning hotel rooms to get by. She arrives home to a letter from her university. It's her fall semester reading list. Total price of textbooks: $600. She freezes.

Each year, 20,000 of the City's high school graduates do not enter college. They fall victim to the phenomenon of “summer melt,” where their ability or confidence to begin college in September simply melts away due to unexpected or onerous expenses, or paperwork, or simply uncertainty about how it could all possibly work.

But WE are here to declare that neither finances, fear, nor the unfamiliar will be a barrier to education and a life of success for our children. And our work to break down these barriers will not stop at high school graduation.

We are giving our students every support they need – including financial help for the things both in plain sight and hiding in the shadows, like textbooks.

We're doubling down on mentoring and advisement. [YMI, HS counselors? NEED MORE INFO ON COLLEGE-GOING CULTURE AND MINDSET INTERVENTIONS]. Readiness isn't just an academic state of mind or set of skills.

Comment [LE16]: More info coming soon.

And we are establishing for every child a college savings account, putting aside $50 for every child put aside the moment they enter our education system. [DETAILS]. This would transform the experience of our student confronted with hundreds of dollars in books. She wouldn't be cowed. She wouldn't freeze. She'd know it's there, and she's draw on her savings account and buy her books.

The sun is behind the skyline and it's 8:30pm. After a morning spent at a part-time job and classes all afternoon and into the evening, a college sophomore enters the subway and carefully puts away her Metrocard. At the right stop, she runs up the stairs and greets her study group inside a public library. They've ridden the train stations all over the City in order to be able to meet in one place and study for the next day's exam.

Right now, 17,000 students of our students who begin college do not finish—an unacceptable situation. Sometimes it's because of thing as basic as not being able to afford transportation to class.

Our student got her Metrocard through a CUNY program called ASAP. ASAP kids are given the support they need to succeed in this and every dimension. They receive Metrocard to get to class. They are given a designated cohort of students to travel with through the four years so peers can lift each other up.

We know it works: [EVIDENCE]. And it is now a national model, replicated in places like [XYZ].

That's why are investing to enroll 7 times as many students over the next four years. [3500 enrolled in FY15 vs 25,000 enrolled in FY19]. [MORE METRICS/DESCRIPTION/TIMELINE]

FLESH OUT: And we're introing new interventions to battle the mindset and paperwork and overwhelm of being in college. These include improving advisement/mentoring – mindset interventions, Low-cost reminders to help stay on top of academic career – text messages, emails, helping kids reapply for FAFSA.

The night ends, the sun rises, and it's 8 a.m. the next day. A college senior grabs her buzzing phone off the kitchen table. It's lighting up with text messages from her mother, her single shepherd, the manager at the internship she just finished – and all the messages are variations on “Go get ‘em!”

She smiles and puts the phone in her purse, then turns to face her reflection in a mirror. She smooths her lapels, takes a deep breath, and catches the elevator right before the doors close. She's on the way out the door for a job interview.

That isn't, of course where the story ends. We hope, of course, that our student gets that job. But we know if she doesn't, she's got the resilience and fortitude to go on another interview, and another after that. We've done right by her by instilling not just the knowledge she needs, but the tools, confidence and belief in herself to share that knowledge with the world, seize opportunities, and achieve success. That's how education in New York City has to work.

In other words: we must and will show each of our kids we believe in their ability to excel. . .

And give them the opportunity to show us we're right.

OPEN QUESTIONS:

- Are we committing to increase the number of CTE programs?
 - CTE students are more likely to graduate high school than their non CTE student counterparts – and have better outcomes for young male students of color
- Where to put accountability piece?:
 - Be accountable for the journey and the destination.
 - Schools are accountable to us not just for test scores and grad rates, but for the rigorous instruction, collaborative teachers, supportive environments, strong family-community ties, effective school leaders, and trust that improve those scores and rates.
 - We—City leaders, school leaders, teachers, parents—are all accountable to our students.
 - We (gov't) are accountable to New Yorkers for our schools' overall successes and difficulties alike.
 - We are giving more information for parents and all NYers on how schools are doing, where they need help, what that help looks like.

<BlogPostDraft2.docx>

The rampant inequality that we face in America is no accident. It is the result of a system that, for too long, has rewarded existing wealth over work.

There is no more striking example of this phenomenon than the disparity between the earnings - and the tax rates - of kindergarten teachers and hedge fund managers.

In 2014, the top 25 hedge fund managers made more money than every single Kindergarten teacher in America -- over 150,000 of them -- combined. That's right: 25 individuals - not even enough to fill the seating space on a single New York City subway car - made more than everyone who teaches our youngest learners put together.

What's more, because of something called carried interest - a tax loophole that exists only to boost the earnings of hedge fund managers - those 25 people paid a lower tax rate than the average Kindergarten teacher.

If we're to truly tackle the crisis of income inequality, changing that rule - and investing that money in growing our middle class - is where we must start.

Here in New York City, we're using every tool at our disposal to help combat income inequality - expanding paid sick leave to 500,000 additional workers, implementing the first rent freeze in city history, building and preserving 200,000 units of affordable housing, expanding after-school programs, and - as of this week - providing high-quality, universal Pre-Kindergarten to every family.

But we need Washington to do its part, too. Making the federal tax code more progressive will allow us to invest in people who are struggling.

To that end, closing the carried interest loophole is a tenet of The Progressive Agenda (URL HERE) to Combat Income Inequality, a 14-point plan introduced by a diverse coalition of progressive leaders in May.

Award-winning filmmaker Robert Greenwald, an inaugural signer of The Progressive Agenda, worked with his colleagues at Brave New Films to produce a powerful short documentary about the deeply unfair income and tax law disparities between hedge fund managers and teachers. It is aptly titled "Hedge Fund Billionaires vs. Kindergarten Teachers: Whose Side Are You On?"

The short film explores this issue from many different angles. It features interviews with both respected economists and Kindergarten teachers. The video identifies both the macroeconomic problems that the huge gap in wages cause, as well as the human toll paid by teachers and their students. Most important, it proposes a real, concrete solution to the problem: closing the carried interest loophole.

Billionaire hedge fund managers don't need a tax break, and there is no reason this loophole should exist.

Robert and I will be hosting a screening of his film at Pace University in New York City on Thursday, September 10th at 4:30 PM. The video will also be live-streamed here on The Huffington Post (STREAMING INFO HERE).

Following the screening, Robert and I will join a panel including TK, TK and moderated by TK to reflect on the film, what it means for New York City and the country, and how we can work together to end this injustice once and for all. By 2014 grads, I assume you mean students who graduated in 2014? That would be the cohort of 2010 – graduation rate of 68.4%, 51,681 graduates

District 7 – Mott Haven, Melrose, Port Morris
District 23 – Ocean Hill, Brownsville, parts of East New York

Other illustrative inequity ideas – the inequities may not be visible when you look at our buildings, but it's clear when you drill down to student outcomes... fewer students walking across the graduation stage to get their diplomas; more empty desks because students are absent, home because a parent could not get them to school or they had a terrible asthma attack

Telling parents about their reading progress – building it into the online parent portal; including more detailed information about reading levels on the DOE-recommended report card; supporting schools to talk with parents about reading progress during conferences

Karin is looking into business partners

I thought we were killing progress pact, or at least letting the Single Shepherd idea absorb it

Thanks for sending this.

I'm a little concerned that this draft still has a lot of the same holes and questions as the one we looked at a week ago, despite the fact that Emmy and Karin and team have sent over a lot of suggestions and answers. I think it is important that someone find the time to incorporate the material we provided, including Emmy's comments, which I have reattached here. Otherwise it will seem tomorrow like we have made much less progress than we have.

On the major initiatives, let me summarize a few of the main changes here:

~~* On second grade reading, we cannot propose an outcome goal because we don't have a way of measuring this yet. Instead, we will propose an input goal, which is that every elementary school will have a reading specialist to help struggling readers get and stay on track. We can also say that we will develop a way to measure and manage this that relies on teachers assessments, and not the introduction of another high-stakes test in 2nd grade.~~

~~* On the "single shepherd," we are now proposing to pilot this in two districts (7 in the South Bronx and 23 in Central Brooklyn) but only for grades 6-12. I strongly urge a new name for this, but I think others will have to convince the boss on this.~~

~~* Instead of College Visits for All, we are proposing a more flexible approach that allows high schools to choose 3 from a menu of programs to help kids get ready and excited for college. We will send along a brief on that. But I think for the speech you can and should say, "We will make sure every middle and high school has the resources and support they need to provide college visits for all students."~~

* We want to describe Algebra for All as "ensuring that all children can complete 4 years of high school math by ensuring that they have the access and support they need to complete algebra no later than 9th grade." After discussing with the experts, we are concerned that a singular focus on algebra on 8th grade is unrealistic and unproductive for us.

* We are not clear what is happening with the CUNY ASAP proposal. We should decide before this next meeting whether it remains in this speech or is held for a separate event on postsecondary persistence and graduation.

Other thoughts on this draft:

~~* The tagline "Every day, every step of the way" is fine, but Carmen recently introduced "Every student, every day" as her "mantra" and it accomplishes a lot of the same. In fact, I like its emphasis on focusing on one student at a time. Maybe good to have the two system leaders using the same line. You could also combine them.~~

~~* I don't think the inequities on p. 1 are the right ones. DOE actually does a pretty good job of making sure facilities and textbooks are equitable. We have a renewal school with a snazzy new greenhouse, for example, and Fair Student Funding has helped a lot. We should focus on the real inequity -- that fewer students at some schools gain the skills they need to succeed.~~

* Along the same lines, I'd like to say something about how poverty and lack of opportunity for families contributes to that inequity. The administration is trying to address it on all fronts, and all the efforts reinforce one another.

* I'm nervous about the use of NAEP scores. Karin, could you share the sources on that? I'm sure they're right, I just want to understand them better.

~~* We are no longer the first city to offer computer science for all, as San Francisco recently beat us to the punch, but we are by far the biggest.~~

* I think the accountability language at the end of the current draft belongs somewhere in pp. 5-6 where you refer to our overall approach. It is important that somewhere he mention the framework or the elements of the framework, or it sounds like he isn't paying attention to the main way we are measuring school progress. One short reference will do it. If you want to say more, we can say that the new School Quality Snapshots, which will replace the report cards and the single letter grade, are coming out in October.

Can we see a new turn tonight or early tomorrow am?

Thanks,

Josh

Sorry for the delay. Been driving around Maine trying to find reliable wifi !

This reflects a lot of what we know about several of the new things the team has been working on, but there are still some things that could be filled in so policy folks, please do a scan to plug in dates/investment #s/anything else it makes sense to include. Some placeholders are here and others you can add (e.g. By 20XX, an investment of $YY million will bring AP classes to all high schools. . .). Andie needs any of these additions by 3 p.m. for printing.

This also reflects the Mayor's miscellaneous notes about things like tipping our hat to MRB, etc.

JDC -- I will email you about a few things under separate cover.

Thanks,

Kate

See attached. I am still working in the Framework and accountability stuff (and poverty/inequity point) at the top but want to make sure that from a programmatic perspective I have captured all the updates accurately so please review!

JDC is working on the charters bit separately and we will plug that in as well shortly.

I think we should end at high school graduation meaning we take out the college textbooks and CUNY ASAP vignette and associated stuff and write a different ending (tear) saving that college and job intvw for the next hit. I can prep a version in that fashion and have both ready.

Thoughts?

Education Vision 2015: Updated September 8, 2015

Equity and Excellence: Every Student, Every Day

Last Wednesday, 1.1 million children put another New York City summer behind them and started the school year.

Could you feel that tidal wave of emotion crash over the whole City, as it always does on that first day? So much joy, excitement, trepidation abounded on sidewalks, in school hallways and lobbies, in cars and buses and trains ferrying families to school in neighborhoods from the South Bronx to the South Shore.

Chirlane and I know those emotions well. Actually, this September is the first in 17 years we haven't been among the public school parents waving goodbye at the entrance. . .swallowing an ocean of feelings as Dante or Chiara walked away into the school year.

We know that families of every kind, in all our city's neighborhoods, share these first-day feelings. But, for many, the common experience of education stops there.

Maybe, once all the parents finally left, a teacher in one school took his new charges to tour a gleaming greenhouse, while a few miles away another was forced to shuffle desks so the leaky roof overhead wouldn't drip down on students.

Maybe in one classroom, students were the first to crack open the latest edition of a classic novel; while across town, it was two students to a tattered old copy, its spine nearly broken from decades of use.

One set of kids is no more deserving of a greenhouse or a falling-apart book than any other. Each is owed the opportunity to have their future determined by hard work and unique talents, as it should be.

But too many of our children's economic futures will be defined by the economic pasts of their neighborhoods. This status quo is unacceptable, un-American, and unfaithful to the legacy and to the promise of New York City.

We all have a stake in its change. As taxpayers, we all pay for public school. As Americans, its value is entrenched in our moral DNA. We've inherited a belief so strong it's almost biological: that this land's richness and riches derive from the success of its people—and this success is available to anyone who puts in the time and the sweat to earn it. Success is not the privilege of a few, but the right of all.

Public education is mandated by law because it is how this core American value should come to life. It's obvious and it's inevitable, it's what makes this country great: our children must go to school, there will always be a school for them to go to, and that school can be a springboard to success for each child.

In other words, our schools must be built on a foundation of both equity and excellence. These principles need to operate hand in hand as the twin engines of our city's large and powerful education system.

We have so much to be proud of—there are so many schools and so many kids who express the city's commitment to equity and excellence each day. In fact, we literally have some of the best students in the country. On a national scale, New York City's children academically outperform than their counterparts in eight of the country's 10 biggest cities. Our low-income students are the highest-performing of all 10 cities. And the one city that outpaces us by a couple of measures is San Diego – a district with one-tenth the students and 5x the funding for each one. Our kids have an awe-inspiring ability to do more with less.

Comment [KB1]: Possible to verify actual proportions here?

To fully appreciate the achievements of today's educators and students, we must also take a moment to see how far we've come. . .and the hard work of our predecessors who enabled reforms in the school system that spurred much of this progress. The Bloomberg Administration's successful fight for Mayoral Control of the Schools paved the way for the record-breaking graduating class of 2014 (the last we have final numbers for as we anxiously await 2015 data in the coming weeks).

More than 51,000 students graduated high school in 2014, reflecting the highest graduation rate in the city's history—and 17,000 more students walking across the stage than a decade ago. The class of 2014 also had the fewest dropouts than any other since NYC started keeping records—9,000 less than ten years ago.

And—this is a less scientific but no less meaningful measure—the great majority of the city’s students and parents like their schools.

Clearly, the city is blessed with smart, hardworking, dedicated and determined children, parents, and educators. Together, they write success stories that transform lives and lift up communities.

There simply have not been enough of those success stories. And too often, those there are emanate from the same neighborhoods—neighborhoods where the school roof doesn’t leak, and the books shine like the glass of the greenhouse. Our education system has been rife with division, and students have paid the price.

The Tale of Two Cities in our schools is unacceptable. But we believe it is NOT inevitable. And we came to City Hall to undo it. [this could use more]

Our vision for the city’s public schools is anchored by a fundamental belief in our children – in every child. We won’t choose among our children who will succeed and who will not.

We believe that every student has both the right and the ability to awaken their minds to the world, to set forth on their journey with the skills, courage and confidence to reach their full potential. Every child can grow into a successful adult—ready for college, ready for life—if their education gives them the right tools.

Over the past 18 months, we have forged those tools. They are powerful instruments of equity and excellence, for our schools and for our students—every day, every step of the way.

Let there be no mistake: the “way” I speak of leads to and includes college.

I often say that education determines economic destiny more now than at any point in human history. Nowhere is that clearer than when looking at the way a life veers towards success when a person completes college. An adult with only a HS diploma is almost three times as likely to be in poverty in NYC as someone with a bachelor's degree or higher, and earns $1.1 million less over the course of a lifetime. [Source: CEO]

And our success as a 21st century global city depends on readying students for success in higher education. Our children are counting on us, but we are counting on THEM to keep New York the most competitive city in the world.

In just five years, two-thirds [65% -- NEED HARD #] of NYC jobs are projected to require some college. [Source: CEO]. For generations, our workforce has been made up of the brightest minds from all over the world, drawn like magnets to the greatest city on earth. That attraction shows no sign of letting up, nor do we want it to, in order to keep the innovative and international flavor that makes us great. But we need more talent, and we need to grow it right here at home.

So: we have set three connected goals around higher education to lift up more of our children and meet the needs of a growing, thriving city.

First, we're going to graduate more kids. Right now, 20,000 students who begin high school in New York City each year do not finish. We do not accept that. We are setting in motion changes so that ten years from now, 9,000 more students will graduate within four years. That will bring us to an 80% graduation rate by 2026. Think of it in context of the all the second graders everywhere in the city, hard at work at this moment—over ten percent more of them will collect their high school diploma.

Comment [KB2]: Do we need to say this or is it assumed? It's a bit confusing so would like to strike unless necessary to demarcate 4 year from 6 year grads

Second, we will make more of those diplomas carry graduates to and through college. Right now, fewer than half [48%] of our high school graduates are college-ready— meaning they truly have the skills to absorb the material taught in a college course. And in nearly half of our high schools [41%?], fewer than 10% of the graduating class is actually ready for college by these standards.

Think about that for a moment. Almost half our schools essentially graduate kids who will find college frustrating, alienating, and probably “not for them” simply because they can’t understand what they are being taught in college. Their only university path would include remedial work, which adds time and expense to the college journey that many of these students just don’t have.

And in a day and age when a college degree is the ticket to a good job, a pathway to the middle class and the most important determining factor to lifelong economic security—we cannot allow this status quo to continue.

So our college readiness goal is two-fold. First of all, we will take the number of public high school graduates who are ready for college from fewer than half [48%, 25,735] to two-thirds (65%) by 2025 – fully 34,000 every year.

Second, we will make sure that every single high school in New York City is capable of graduating college-ready students. No longer will families worry that graduation is simply a seal of approval on the 15 years of the past, as opposed to a real promise for the future.

Excellence will not be portioned out for the lucky few. All our schools will be equitably served to lift up all our children.

Today I will clarify the vision of how we get there.

We are of course already hard at work, and in 18 months we’ve made some tremendous strides. We’ve planned, funded, and rolled out full-day, high-quality, universal pre-k, as well as an unprecedented expansion of after-school for middle schoolers. Test scores are up for the second consecutive year, and the first full year on our watch.

More efforts are underway than what’s covered in the news, and we’ll shine a light on them today. Still others you will hear about for the very first time. And as I share the work we are doing, so too will I illustrate the ideas that animate it—the ideas that underpin an equitable and excellent school system for every child.

We will start from a fundamental place: how the City works with those who teach our children. We have redefined this relationship, premised on the belief that we must work with educators, not against them. We must value their expertise and show respect for the work they do every day. We must work harder to retain our teaching talent. And, crucially, we must grow that talent by giving all our educators the training and development they need to deepen their skills.

This professional development is a cornerstone of our reforms in every grade, and something the Chancellor—who started as a rookie teacher and has had nearly every level of job in our public education system since—speaks about with particular passion. She believes that the best way to deepen teachers’ skills is to spread what works—connecting the whole education system so educators can lift each other up, with veteran educators spreading the practices that spur success to fellow teachers and principals.

Our goal is to make sure there ARE more veteran educators to do this in the years ahead. So we are laying the groundwork now to create more expert teachers for the future, who will in turn pay forward the wisdom and skills they acquired from those who taught them.

Certainly, the vast majority of our educators are talented, passionate, and deeply dedicated to their students and schools. There are, however, some teachers in our schools who should be in a learning environment. And those teachers will not remain there. We fundamentally believe in making the change that’s necessary to help schools succeed, and that has already driven us to remove 700+ teachers. In other cases, we will replace school leadership or transform a school itself if they cannot improve with our tailored and targeted support.

And working with our teachers, we have created several schools—PROSE Schools—that are not beholden to labor work rules, and therefore have the unique freedom to “color outside the lines.” We will take the most successful elements of these experiments in school administration and teaching and look hard at ways to bring them to other schools. . .allowing more educators to break through formerly impenetrable boundaries in the service of helping kids learn better.

- Be accountable for the journey and the destination.

- Schools are accountable to us not just for test scores and grad rates, but for the rigorous instruction, collaborative teachers, supportive environments, strong family-community ties, effective school leaders, and trust that improve those scores and rates.
- We—City leaders, school leaders, teachers, parents—are all accountable to our students.
- We (gov't) are accountable to New Yorkers for our schools' overall successes and difficulties alike.
- We are giving more information for parents and all NYers on how schools are doing, where they need help, what that help looks like.

Framework for Great Schools. If you want to say more, we can say that the new School Quality Snapshots, which will replace the report cards and the single letter grade, are coming out in October. Of course, we know that no two schools and no two children need the same support in order to excel. The unique chemistry of every single school means that each needs a different set of supports to offer the best for its students. And each child will travel his or her own academic, social, and emotional journey. We can't, in the interest of wholesale success, sell education wholesale to all students. They're not our customers. They're our children.

That's why we have committed to going beyond academic matters to address the full slate of issues that really engineer success. The cornerstone of this is our Community Schools initiative – 130 schools across the city that support the needs of the whole child. Community Schools might provide counseling services so students have a safe place to share her struggles and successes alike. They offer free vision exams and glasses so kids can see the blackboard. They might have a food pantry so hunger doesn't distract from learning. They might offer English classes for families so parents can help kids with their homework.

And Community Schools are modeling communication and continuity within the school walls and outside them. These practices have inspired an idea that will directly connect more families across the city with the people and places that define a student's educational journey, and bring us one step closer to ending the era of families ricocheting around inside a mammoth bureaucracy.

We are piloting a program to give the children and families who need it most their own strong, supportive hand —to guide them in the long term through the landscape of teachers and tests, to help clear the tough hurdles and celebrate strong successes, and—most of all—to chart and clarify a path to high school graduation..

In one year, every single 6th through 12th grader in two of our most struggling neighborhoods and school districts—Mott Haven and Melrose in the South Bronx’s District 7, and Brownsville in Brooklyn’s District 23, will have their first meeting with their Personal Counselor. This will be the first of dozens of encounters between students and counselors along the journey. The Shepherd won’t simply implore students to keep their eyes on the prize, but actually show them how to get there.

Let's imagine a few points on that journey for some of our children, across the city, over the course of their day.

We’ll start first thing in the morning. It’s 8am, and a four year-old is intently focused on building a tower of blocks, stacking carefully as her classmates play behind her – some singing with a teacher, some drawing early masterpieces, some gazing at beginner books. It’s a lively and alive place, filled with the sounds and colors that awaken young children to the world.

This is the critical moment where success begins. We fundamentally believe all children must start their education earlier so they are poised to reap the benefits of kindergarten – and everything that comes after.

I’ll repeat what I’ve said before: we cannot get education right if we do not get it right from the beginning. I’m very proud that last week, we started getting it right for 70,000 of our kids, who began our free, universal, high-quality pre-K. Block towers are rising all across this great city.

Around the same time, across town, a second grader rides the bus to school with a parent, proudly showing off the book the class has been reading—explaining what it’s about and which character she played in a class activity yesterday. Her parent smiles and plays along—the second grader doesn’t know that yesterday her parent and her teacher actually spoke about it on the phone. The teacher called for a few minutes just to let her know that the student did a great job, and share an update on her reading progress.

It's nearly impossible to overemphasize the value of these kinds of interactions—both the simple phone call from teacher to parent, and that moment of sharing between child and parent. Parents are the first and last teachers of children, and must be our partners in everything we do.

That's why we knocked on thousands of doors this summer to make sure families knew what to expect in the year ahead. It's why we instituted an unprecedented 40 minutes of teacher time dedicated solely to connecting with parents. Maybe this is the time during which our imaginary teacher made her phone call to share this news. . .this news which is so prized not just by the family, but to all of us and all our educators.

One second grader's proud announcement that he or she read lines in a class activity reflects a milestone of epic proportion in that child's life: literacy. Reading is the very baseline of lifelong success. It is the foundation of learning in all subjects, of course, and for academic achievement, but it's worth so much more. Reading is how our kids explore the world and learn to think about it. It makes them engaged with society and equips them with the tools to change it. Reading is the key.

And so we are introducing a reading specialist to every single elementary school in the City to help struggling readers get—and stay—on track. The conventional standard is to measure literacy at the end of 3rd grade, but our goal is to have every single second-grader reading. We want as many children as possible to walk into their third grade classroom, pick a book off the shelf, and go to town.

This may sound ambitious. But waiting till the third-grade year may be too late for some kids: a risk we are not willing to take. It's too important and the stakes are too high.

The research is in: students who are not reading proficiently by the end of third grade are four times more likely to drop out of high school than proficient readers.

Comment [KB3]: Do we have research showing how/why specialists are so effective?

Conversely, students above grade level for reading in third grade graduate and enroll in college at higher rates than students at or below grade level.

So we don't shy away from ambitious standards that provide the foundation for success. Aiming high is one of our core principles—and simply part of who we are. New York has the most rigorous curriculum standards and administers the toughest tests in the nation. We expect everyone to embrace this aim for excellence, translate it into specific ambitions, and transform those ambitions into achievement.

And a word about how those tests fit into the broader picture. Yes, they are tough. But we treat tests as an important thing, not THE important thing. Tests only tell you that you need to improve and where that improvement is needed—not how to get it done. That's where committed and talented teachers are necessary for success—where teachers like the one our second grader has makes all the difference.

In fact, it's our reading specialists, together with teachers, who will measure and manage progress of our second graders—not another high-stakes test.

Let's turn back to the world of our students. A few hours later, it's noon, and an eighth grader is hunched over an algebra book in the library. She finally solves $A^2 + B^2 = C^2$, sits back in wonder, and glances up at the clock to see how many minutes are left till her advisory session, when she can tell her adviser how hard it was—and how it feels to finally get it.

Our student been struggling with a lot of anger, frustration, and sadness this year, and her adviser's office has been her sanctuary. They talk for half an hour, and then the adviser sends our student home with a family permission form to participate in a big day next week: a college tour. She'll be the first in her family to see the inside of a college classroom.

Middle school is a deeply important time. It's when an actual vision of success as an adult—college, a career—can come into focus. . .if we show it to our students. We are going to show them, and we are going to prepare them so that every middle school student is socially, emotionally, and academically ready for high school, and exposed to college by the time they enter 9th grade.

First, College Access for All will come to our schools. The “All” here actually includes students AND families, for whom we are making college real, tangible, and accessible by equipping their schools with the resources they need to create a truly “college-going culture.”

By 20XX, every middle and high school student will have the chance to visit an NYC college, parents will be attending workshops on how to afford it, mentorships will connect public school students with those already enrolled in college, and more.

Comment [KB4] : Are we the first to do this?

Second, we won’t relegate ANY of our kids to dreaming about aiming and achieving high—starting in middle school, we’ll show them. We have already committed to getting 100,000 kids internships, mentorships, and summer jobs by 2025—including our most vulnerable children in foster homes and shelter. We are doubling down on that today: every middle and high school will have a business partner [EXPLAIN WHAT THIS IS/DOES].

Third, we have zeroed in on one of the key skills that students need to stay on pace to get to college: algebra. Research shows it [WHAT ARE THE IMPROVEMENTS?], but students at lower-performing schools have been locked out of this because the schools do not offer it. But that’s in the past. The future for our kids and our city is Algebra for All.

Beginning in 20XX, we will expand algebra across middle and high schools so that every student completes algebra by the end of 9th grade and can move on to the more advanced high school math that will ready them for college

These middle years can also be tremendously hard for many kids, and for their families—to this day I often say I’m a Recovering Middle School Parent. All this ambition, all these skills, will take root if and only if our kids are socially and emotionally ready for these experiences, and what’s to come with the rigors of high school. And that’s not easy for a lot of our kids, who are battling tough situations at home, or among their friends, or just with the difficulties of growing up.

My wife, Chirlane, has been deeply focused on the mental health needs of our kids. She's working with the Administration to revolutionize how we deal with mental health in this city, especially for those with the greatest need and the fewest options. You'll hear a lot more about that in the near future.

These battles can interfere with learning. And we are determined, as a City, to break down all barriers to learning so children come to school ready to succeed. We must fulfill our children's basic prerequisites to learning, accounting for mental and physical health, family stability and support, financial hurdles, and more. Community Schools are the bedrock of these efforts, and this month marks the moment when every last one of the 130 schools we have targeted completes its transformation into a Community School.

Time is passing: it's 3:30pm, and a tenth grader runs her fingers over the pages of her English Language Arts workbook. As a recent immigrant, she needs to pass the English Regents to graduate—so the school staff has created this extended learning period for her and the 15 other English Language Learners in the class. There's a little tap on her back, and our student turns to find a small folded-up piece of paper on the floor right next to her chair. (Some things never change. . .like passing notes in class.) She catches out of the corner of her eye a friend and fellow student grinning. She unfolds the note and reads: "Computer Lab before 2nd period tomorrow?"

Before we think about the computer lab tomorrow, let's think about where our students are right now. Extended learning time—an extra hour of instruction each day—is a hallmark of our 94 Renewal Schools. These 94 schools are those that have struggled the most to serve their students and families and provide a solid education to our children. So we are rolling out sweeping reforms that touch every part of those schools—transforming the classrooms and the culture to turn the tables of history for the school and its community.

In addition to extra class time, Renewal School students are seeing bigger, better libraries. New writing programs. Educators are receiving extra professional development, especially around that new writing curricula and STEM teaching. We have a dynamite team, led by Aimee Horowitz, that is dedicated to implementing these changes and lifting up these schools.

And it's working. Attendance - a leading indicator for academic improvements - went up at 72 of the 94 Renewal Schools, and suspensions are dramatically down. The number of schools classified as Persistently Dangerous has been cut by more than half. Test scores overall are up in 2015 (0.6% in Math, 1.2% in English). Individual schools saw tremendous gains, such as an 8.1% improvement at Multicultural High School and a 4.6% improvement at JHS 022*. And when graduation data comes in this fall, we expect to see that it's gone up.

Teachers are more confident in the direction of their schools—fully two-thirds say they wouldn't want to work in any other school, a jump from last year. And Renewal School parents are engaging with their child's school: almost 7 out of 10 families communicated with their child's teacher at least once a month, with more than half meeting in person at a parent-teacher conference on a monthly basis.

And—this is a big one—more than a quarter of Renewal School parents volunteered to support their child's school at least once a month last year. This is time out a life likely filled to the brim with work, childcare, or schooling of their own. It shows that parents are understanding the impact only they can have in a school community, and how that lifts up everyone—including their own child—higher than they ever thought.

For too long, we haven't even given students the chance to aim high in high school, because they haven't been offered the chance to do advanced work—a chance that we know, when taken, correlates with success. You can't shoot for the moon if there's no rocket to take you there.

That ends today. Today we offer every high schooler the chance to aim and achieve high. We are introducing AP for All: bringing Advanced Placement classes to every high school by 20XX. It's been shown that overall, students who take AP classes were twice as likely to graduate college in 5 year as compared to their peers who did not. Among minority and low-income populations, they were X times as likely. Simple exposure to the material can have a lasting impact;

Comment [LE5]:

- We are on track to transition all Renewal Schools to Community Schools
- All 94 schools have been matched with a Community Based Organization (CBO)
- 72 of 94 Community School Directors have been hired
- 31,197 of 38,000 homes visited through door-knocking campaign
- 93 of 94 mental health assessments completed

Comment [KB6]: Do we have comparative data?

students who sat for an AP exam and only received a score of 1-2 (of 5) graduated college at a higher rate than their peers who did not take AP exams at all.

And now, back to that computer lab. Both computer equipment and Computer Science training is a novelty for many students and teachers, including those at nearly all of our Renewal Schools. Fewer than 5% of all NYC public school students have an opportunity to learn Computer Science, and those that do are clustered in just a few high-performing schools.

This is not sustainable for students or for our city, which increasingly needs more people with the computer proficiency to power all kinds of companies, from tech to finance to health to fashion. Hundreds of thousands of good jobs will be accessible to those with computer science skills, and beyond the reach of those without them.

That is why we are immensely proud to announce today the launch of Computer Science for All, which will provide a computer science education to every single public school student within ten years through an $81 million public-private partnership between the City of New York and CSNYC.

This is the largest effort to expand computer science in the country. It will make New York the largest school district in the nation to provide computer science to every student—and the first City to invest in the future of its students and its economy in this pioneering way.

Now it's 5pm. A recent graduate comes home from her summer job. She's done it—the days and nights of hard work, struggles and ultimately victories have earned her admission to college [CUNY?]. Money is tight for her, as it is for so many New Yorkers. So maybe she's working at a fast food restaurant, or cleaning hotel rooms to get by. She arrives home to a letter from her university. It's her fall semester reading list. Total price of textbooks: $600. She freezes.

Each year, 20,000 of the City's high school graduates do not enter college. They fall victim to the phenomenon of “summer melt,” where their ability or confidence to begin college in September simply melts away due to unexpected or onerous expenses, or paperwork, or simply uncertainty about how it could all possibly work.

But WE are here to declare that neither finances, fear, nor the unfamiliar will be a barrier to education and a life of success for our children. And our work to break down these barriers will not stop at high school graduation.

We are giving our students every support they need – including financial help for the things both in plain sight and hiding in the shadows, like textbooks.

[We're doubling down on mentoring and advisement. [YMI, HS counselors? NEED MORE INFO ON COLLEGE-GOING CULTURE AND MINDSET INTERVENTIONS]. Readiness isn't just an academic state of mind or set of skills.

Comment [LE7] : More info coming soon.

And we are establishing for every child a college savings account, putting aside $50 for every child put aside the moment they enter our education system.

[DETAILS]. This would transform the experience of our student confronted with hundreds of dollars in books. She wouldn't be cowed. She wouldn't freeze. She'd know it's there, and she's draw on her savings account and buy her books.

The sun is behind the skyline and it's 8:30pm. After a morning spent at a part-time job and classes all afternoon and into the evening, a college sophomore enters the subway and carefully puts away her Metrocard. At the right stop, she runs up the stairs and greets her study group inside a public library. They've ridden the train stations all over the City in order to be able to meet in one place and study for the next day's exam.

Right now, 17,000 students of our students who begin college do not finish—an unacceptable situation. Sometimes it's because of thing as basic as not being able to afford transportation to class.

Our student got her Metrocard through a CUNY program called ASAP. ASAP kids are given the support they need to succeed in this and every dimension. They receive Metrocard to get to class. They are given a designated cohort of students to travel with through the four years so peers can lift each other up.

We know it works: [EVIDENCE]. And it is now a national model, replicated in places like [XYZ].

That's why are investing to enroll 7 times as many students over the next four years. [3500 enrolled in FY15 vs 25,000 enrolled in FY19]. [MORE METRICS/DESCRIPTION/TIMELINE]

FLESH OUT: And we're introducing new interventions to battle the mindset and paperwork and overwhelm of being in college. These include improving advisement/mentoring – mindset interventions, Low-cost reminders to help stay on top of academic career – text messages, emails, helping kids reapply for FAFSA.

The night ends, the sun rises, and it's 8 a.m. the next day. A college senior grabs her buzzing phone off the kitchen table. It's lighting up with text messages from her mother, her single shepherd, the manager at the internship she just finished – and all the messages are variations on “Go get ‘em!”

She smiles and puts the phone in her purse, then turns to face her reflection in a mirror. She smooths her lapels, takes a deep breath, and catches the elevator right before the doors close. She's on the way out the door for a job interview.

That isn't, of course where the story ends. We hope, of course, that our student gets that job. But we know if she doesn't, she's got the resilience and fortitude to go on another interview, and another after that. We've done right by her by instilling not just the knowledge she needs, but the tools, confidence and belief in herself to share that knowledge with the world, seize opportunities, and achieve success. That's how education in New York City has to work.

In other words: we must and will show each of our kids we believe in their ability to excel. . .

And give them the opportunity to show us we're right.

Education Vision 2015: Updated ~~August 31~~September 8, 2015, 2015

Equity and Excellence: Every Student, Every Day, Every Step of the Way

Last Wednesday, 1.1 million children put another New York City summer behind them and started the school year.

Could you feel that tidal wave of emotion crash over the whole City, as it always does on that first day? So much joy, excitement, trepidation abounded on sidewalks, in school hallways and lobbies, in cars and buses and trains ferrying families to school in neighborhoods from the South Bronx to the South Shore.

Chirlane and I know those emotions well. Actually, this September is the first in 17 years we haven't been among the public school parents waving goodbye at the entrance. . .swallowing an ocean of feelings as Dante or Chiara walked away into the school year.

We know that families of every kind, in all our city's neighborhoods, share these first-day feelings. But, for many, the common experience of education stops there.

Maybe, once all the parents finally left, a teacher in one school took his new charges to tour a gleaming greenhouse, while a few miles away another was forced to shuffle desks so the leaky roof overhead wouldn't drip down on students.

Maybe in one classroom, students were the first to crack open the latest edition of a classic novel; while across town, it was two students to a tattered old copy, its spine nearly broken from decades of use.

One set of kids is no more deserving of a greenhouse or a ~~falling apart~~tattered book than any other. Each is owed the opportunity to have their future determined by hard work and unique talents, as it should be.

But too many of our children's economic futures will be defined by the economic pasts of their neighborhoods. This status quo is unacceptable, un-American, and unfaithful to the legacy and to the promise of New York City.

We all have a stake in its change. As taxpayers, we all pay for public school. As Americans, its value is entrenched in our moral DNA. We've inherited a belief so strong it's almost biological: that this land's richness and riches derive from the success of its people—and this success is available to anyone who puts in the time and the sweat to earn it. Success is not the privilege of a few, but the right of all.

Public education is mandated by law because it is how this core American value should come to life. It's obvious and it's inevitable, it's what makes this country great: our children must go to school, there will always be a school for them to go to, and that school can be a springboard to success for each child.

In other words, our schools must be built on a foundation of both equity and excellence. These principles need to operate hand in hand as the twin engines of our city's large and powerful education system.

We have so much to be proud of—there are so many schools and so many kids who express the city's commitment to equity and excellence each day. In fact, we literally have some of the best students in the country. On a national scale, New York City's children academically outperform than their counterparts in eight of the country's 10 biggest cities. Our low-income students are the highest-performing of all 10 cities. And the one city that outpaces us by a couple of measures is San Diego – a district with one-tenth the students and 5x the funding for each one. Our kids have an awe-inspiring ability to do more with less.

Comment [KB1]: Possible to verify actual proportions here?

To fully appreciate the achievements of today's educators and students, we must also take a moment to see how far we've come. . . and the hard work of our predecessors who enabled reforms in the school system that spurred much of this progress. ~~Had it not been for the Bloomberg Administration's successful fight for -of Mayor Bloomberg not pushed for and acquired -n-Mayoral c-Control of the s-Schools paved the way for the record-breaking graduating class of 2014. XXXX graduated a few weeks ago, reflect - we probably would not be graduating X more high schoolers than we were ten years ago, and Y more than 20 years ago—the highest graduation rate in the city's history—17,000 more than a decade ago—and the . Test scores have increased LA LA LA WHAT PROGRESS HERE OVER WHAT TIME FRAME?.~~

The 2014 graduating class had fewerst dropouts than any other since NYC started keeping records—9,000 less than a ten years ago. And—this is a less scientific but no less meaningful measure—the great majority of the city’s students and parents like their schools.

Clearly, the city is blessed with smart, hardworking, dedicated and determined children, parents, and educators. Together, they write success stories that transform lives and lift up communities.

There simply have not been enough of those success stories. And too often, ~~those~~ ~~there are~~ the success stories emanate from the same neighborhoods—neighborhoods where the school roof doesn’t leak, and the books shine like the glass of the greenhouse. Our education system has been rife with division, and students have paid the price.

Formatted: Font: Bold

The Tale of Two Cities in our schools is unacceptable. But we believe it is NOT inevitable. And we came to City Hall to help ~~undo it~~ address it. [this could use more]

Our vision for the city’s public schools is anchored by a fundamental belief in our children – in every child. We won’t choose among our children who will succeed and who will not.

That means every child in every public school – whether a charter school, or traditional public school. So today, we’re proposing a plan to make it easier for families to apply to charter schools – by including them in our central school enrollment system. For those families, entering a charter lottery would be exactly as easy as applying for a traditional public school. No longer would they be forced to make their way through a separate, sometimes tedious process. Under our plan, every family would list 12 choices for elementary school, in preference order – including both charter and traditional public schools. A child would be matched with the school with available seats that the child’s family ranked highest. It’s a common-sense approach to unlocking more options for every child, no matter what neighborhood or family they come from.

We believe that every student has both the right and the ability to awaken their minds to the world, to set forth on their journey with the skills, courage and confidence to reach their full potential. Every child can grow into a successful adult—ready for college, ready for life—if their education gives them the right tools.

Over the past 18 months, we have ~~forged~~ expanded and sharpened (?) those tools. They are powerful instruments of equity and excellence, for our schools and for our students—every day, every step of the way.

Let there be no mistake: the “way” I speak of leads to and includes college.

I often say that education determines economic destiny more now than at any point in human history. Nowhere is that clearer than when looking at the way a life veers towards success when a person completes college. An adult with only a HS diploma is almost three times as likely to be in poverty in NYC as someone with a bachelor’s degree or higher, and earns $1.1 million less over the course of a lifetime. [Source: CEO]

And our success as a 21st century global city depends on readying students for success in higher education. Our children are counting on us, but we are counting on THEM to keep New York the most competitive city in the world.

In just five years, two-thirds [65% -- NEED HARD #] of NYC jobs are projected to require some college. [Source: CEO]. For generations, our workforce has been made up of the brightest minds from all over the world, drawn like magnets to the greatest city on earth. That attraction shows no sign of letting up, nor do we want it to, in order to keep the innovative and international flavor that makes us great. But we need more talent, and we need to grow it right here at home.

So: we have set three connected goals around higher education to lift up more of our children and meet the needs of a growing, thriving city.

First, we're going to graduate more kids. Right now, 20,000 students who begin high school in New York City each year do not finish. ~~We do not refuse to accept that status quo~~that. We are setting in motion changes so that ten years from now, 9,000 more students will graduate within four years. That will bring us to an 80% graduation rate by 2026. Think of it in context of the all the second graders everywhere in the city, hard at work at this moment—~~By 2020, 75% of our high school students will graduate within four years. That will mean an extra 5,000 graduates each year from 2020 on. OR: By 2026, 80% of our students will graduate within four years. That will mean an extra X,000 graduates each year or more — from 2026 on. Another way to think about it: over ten percent more of all the second graders who just started school will of them will collect-earn~~ their high school diploma.

Comment [KB2]: Do we need to say this or is it assumed? It's a bit confusing so would like to strike unless necessary to demarcate 4 year from 6 year grads

Second, we will make more of those diplomas carry graduates to and through college. Right now, fewer than half [48%] of our high school graduates are college-ready— meaning they truly have the skills to absorb the material taught in a college course. And in nearly half of our high schools [~~41%~~], fewer than 10% of the graduating class is actually ready for college by these standards.

Think about that for a moment. Almost half our schools essentially graduate kids who will find college frustrating, alienating, and probably “not for them” simply because they can't understand what they are being taught in college. Their only university path would include remedial work, which adds time and expense to the college journey that many of these students just don't have.

Comment [JD3]: Do we need to explain what remedial means?

And in a day and age when a college degree is the ticket to a good job, a pathway to the middle class and the most important determining factor to lifelong economic security—we cannot allow this status quo to continue.

So our college readiness goal is two-fold. First of all, we will take the number of public high school graduates who are ready for college from fewer than half [48%, ~~25,735~~] to two-thirds (65%) by 2025 – fully 34,000 students every year. ~~HOW MANY ACTUAL GRADS IS THAT?]~~

Formatted: Highlight

Second, we will make sure that every single high school in New York City is capable of graduating college-ready students. No longer will families worry that graduation is simply a seal of approval on the 15 years of the past, as opposed to a real promise for the future.

Excellence will not be portioned out for the lucky few. ~~All our school will be, but~~ equitably served ~~to all our schools~~ to lift up all our children.

Today I ~~will clarify~~ want to describe ~~the~~ our vision of how we get there.

We are of course already hard at work, and in 18 months we've made some tremendous strides. We've planned, funded, and rolled out full-day, high-quality, universal pre-k, as well as an unprecedented expansion of after-school for middle schoolers. Test scores are up for the second consecutive year, and the first full year on our watch.

More efforts are underway than what's covered in the news, and we'll shine a light on them today. Still others you will hear about for the very first time. And as I share the work we are doing, so too will I illustrate the ideas that animate it—the ideas that underpin an equitable and excellent school system for every child.

We will start from a fundamental place: how the City works with those who teach our children. We have redefined this relationship, premised on the belief that we must work with educators, not against them. We must value their expertise and show respect for the work they do every day. We must work harder to retain our teaching talent. And, crucially, we must grow that talent by giving all our educators the training and development they need to deepen their skills.

This professional development is a cornerstone of our reforms in every grade, and something the Chancellor—who started as a rookie teacher and has had nearly every level of job in our public education system since—speaks about with particular passion. She believes that the best way to deepen teachers' skills is to spread what works—connecting the whole education system so educators can lift each other up, with veteran educators spreading the practices that spur success to fellow teachers and principals.

Our goal is to make sure there ARE more veteran educators to do this in the years ahead. So we are laying the groundwork now to create more expert teachers for the future, who will in turn pay forward the wisdom and skills they acquired from those who taught them.

Certainly, the vast majority of our educators are talented, passionate, and deeply dedicated to their students and schools. There are, however, some teachers in our schools who should be in a learning environment. And those teachers will not remain there. We fundamentally believe in making the change that's necessary to help schools succeed, and that has already driven us to remove 700+ underperforming teachers. In other cases, we will replace school leadership or transform a school itself if they-it cannot improve with our tailored and targeted support.

And working with our teachers, we have created several schools—PROSE Schools—that are not beholden-confined to labor work rules, and therefore have the unique freedom to “color outside the lines.” We will take the most successful elements of these experiments in school administration and teaching and look hard at ways to bring them to other schools. . .allowing more educators to break through formerly impenetrable boundaries in the service of helping kids learn better.

- Be accountable for the journey and the destination.
 - Schools are accountable to us not just for test scores and grad rates, but for the rigorous instruction, collaborative teachers, supportive environments, strong family-community ties, effective school leaders, and trust that improve those scores and rates.
 - We—City leaders, school leaders, teachers, parents—are all accountable to our students.
 - We (gov't) are accountable to New Yorkers for our schools' overall successes and difficulties alike.
 - We are giving more information for parents and all NYers on how schools are doing, where they need help, what that help looks like.

Framework for Great Schools. If you want to say more, we can say that the new School Quality Snapshots, which will replace the report cards and the single letter grade, are coming out in October.

Of course, we know that no two schools and no two children need the same support in order to excel. The unique chemistry of every single school means that each needs a different set of supports to offer the best for its students.

And each child will travel his or her own academic, social, and emotional journey.

We can't, in the interest of wholesale success, sell education wholesale to all students. They're not our customers. They're our children.

That's why we have committed to going beyond academic matters to address the full slate of issues that really engineer success. The cornerstone of this is our Community Schools initiative – 130 schools across the city that support the needs of the whole child. Community Schools might provide counseling services so students have a safe place to share her struggles and successes alike. They offer free vision exams and glasses so kids can see the blackboard. They might have a food pantry so hunger doesn't distract from learning. They might offer English classes for families so parents can help kids with their homework.

And Community Schools are modeling communication and continuity within the school walls and outside them. These practices have inspired an idea that will directly connect more families across the city with the people and places that define a student's educational journey, and bring us one step closer to ending the era of families ricocheting around inside a mammoth bureaucracy.

We are piloting a program to give the children and families who need it most a their own strong, supportive hand hand-to-hold-from-pre-K-until-they-graduate-from-high-school—a "single-shepherd" to guide families through-to-guide them in the long term through the landscape of teachers and tests, to help clear the tough hurdles and celebrate strong successes, and—most of all—to chart and clarify a path to high school graduation.the educational journey.

Beginning iIn one year, every single 6th through 12th grader in ~~in two~~ of our most struggling neighborhoods and school districts—Mott Haven and Melrose in the South Bronx's District 7, and Brownsville in Brooklyn's District 23, every single one of the district's ~~XX~~ families will have their first meeting with their Personal Counselor. This will be the first of dozens of encounters between students and ~~counselors along the journey. The Shepherd won't simply implore students to keep their eyes on the prize, but actually show them how to get there. have someone to guide them for the long term through the landscape of teachers and tests, someone to help clear the tough hurdles and celebrate strong successes.~~

~~In~~ In middle school, the [SHEPHERD] will develop the Student's Progress Pact, a living contract among our students, families, teachers, and school leaders. It will ~~chart the path to success. outline how each student will reach the goal of graduating from high school, making it to college, and succeeding all the way through. It will help students and families see that no obstacle is insurmountable on the journey to graduation.~~

Let's imagine a few points on that journey for some of our children, across the city, over the course of their day.

We'll start first thing in the morning. It's 8am, and a four year-old is intently focused on building a tower of blocks, stacking carefully as her classmates play behind her – some singing with a teacher, some drawing early masterpieces, some gazing at beginner books. It's a lively and alive place, filled with the sounds and colors that awaken young children to the world.

This is the critical moment where success begins. We fundamentally believe all children must start their education earlier so they are poised to reap the benefits of Kkindergarten – and everything that comes after.

I'll repeat what I've said before: we cannot get education right if we do not get it right from the beginning. I'm very proud that last week, we started getting it right for 70,000 of our kids, who began our free, universal, high-quality pre-K. Block towers are rising all across this great city.

Around the same time, across town, a second grader rides the bus to school with a parent, proudly showing off the book the class has been reading—explaining what it's about and which character she played in a class activity yesterday. Her parent smiles and plays along—the second grader doesn't know that yesterday her parent and her teacher actually spoke about it on the phone. The teacher called for a few minutes just to let her know that the student did a great job, and share an update on her reading progress.

It's nearly impossible to overemphasize the value of these kinds of interactions—both the simple phone call from teacher to parent, and that moment of sharing between child and parent. Parents are the first and last teachers of children, and must be our partners in everything we do.

That's why we knocked on thousands of doors this summer to make sure families knew what to expect in the year ahead. It's why we instituted an unprecedented 40 minutes of teacher time dedicated solely to connecting with parents. Maybe this is the time during which our ~~imaginary~~ teacher made her phone call to share this news. ~~...this news which is so prized -which doesn't just mean the world to~~ not just by the family, but also to all of us and all ~~the our~~ educators. --

~~Because~~ One second grader's proud announcement that he or she read lines in a class activity ~~is reflects one step closer to a~~ milestone of epic proportion in that child's life: literacy. Reading is the very baseline of lifelong success. It is the foundation of learning in all subjects, of course, and for academic achievement, but it's worth so much more. Reading is how our kids explore the world and learn to think about it. It makes them engaged with society and equips them with the tools to change it. Reading is the key.

And so we are introducing a reading specialist to every single elementary school in the City to ~~our new goal of XX literacy for ALL second graders.~~ help struggling readers get—and stay—on track. The conventional standard is to measure literacy at the end of 3rd grade, but our goal is to have every single second-grader reading. We want as many children as possible to walk into their third grade classroom, pick a book off the shelf, and go to town.

This may sound ambitious. But waiting till the third-grade year may be too late for some kids: a risk we are not willing to take. It's too important and the stakes are too high.

The research is in: ~~students who are not reading proficiently by the end of third grade are four times more likely to drop out of high school than proficient readers.~~

Conversely, students above grade level for reading in third grade graduate and enroll in college at higher rates than students at or below grade level.

~~Our goal is to have every single second grader reading, and, by 2017, to make sure every parent of a K-2 child knows their kid's reading progress. We know that when parents know how their child is doing, they help their child do better.~~

~~This may sound ambitious—many other places hold 3rd grade as their reading standard. But the research is in. Kids who can read at grade level by the time they walk into their third grade classroom for the first time do [X BETTER — NEED TO QUANTIFY].~~

~~So we don't~~ shy away from ambitious standards that provide the foundation for success. Aiming high is one of our core principles—and simply part of who we are. New York has the most rigorous curriculum standards and administers the toughest tests in the nation. We expect everyone to embrace this aim for excellence, translate it into specific ambitions, and transform those ambitions into achievement.

And a word about how those tests fit into the broader picture. Yes, they are tough. But we treat tests as an important thing, not THE important thing. Tests only tell you that you need to improve and where that improvement is needed—not how to get it done. That's where committed and talented teachers are necessary for success—where teachers like the one our second grader has makes all the difference.

In fact, it's our reading specialists, together with teachers, who will measure and manage progress of our second graders—not another high-stakes test.

Let's turn back to the world of our students. A few hours later, it's noon, and an eighth grader is hunched over an algebra book in the library. She finally solves $A^2 + B^2 = C^2$, sits back in wonder, and glances up at the clock to see how many minutes are left till her advisory session, when she can tell her adviser how hard it was—and how it feels to finally get it.

Our student been struggling with a lot of anger, frustration, and sadness this year, and her adviser’s office has been her sanctuary. They talk for half an hour, and then the adviser sends our student home with a family permission form to participate in a big day next week: a college tour. She’ll be the first in her family to see the inside of a college classroom.

Middle school is a deeply important time. It’s when an actual vision of success as an adult—college, a career—can come into focus. . .if we show it to our students. We are going to show them, and we are going to prepare them so that every middle school student is socially, emotionally, and academically ready for high school, and exposed to college by the time they enter 9th grade.

ADDITIONAL LANGUAGE ON AFTER-SCHOOL?

First, College Visits for All will come to every middle school by 20XX. we are proposing a more flexible approach that allows high schools to choose 3 from a menu of programs to help kids get ready and excited for college. We will send along a brief on that. But I think for the speech you can and should say, "We will make sure every middle and high school has the resources and support they need to provide college visits for all students. Every student will go on at least two college tours in middle school – one with their school and one with a parent – and at least two additional tours in high school. Exposing students and their families to college campuses beginning in middle school will reinforce a college-going mindset, encourage earlier conversations about college going, and motivate students to work toward college readiness. And continuing those tours in high school will keep students oriented toward higher education, and support students in identifying the strongest college fit,

Second, we have zeroed in on one of the key skills that students need to stay on pace to get to college: algebra. Research shows it [WHAT ARE THE IMPROVEMENTS?], but students at lower-performing schools have been locked out of this because the schools do not offer it. But that’s in the past. The future for our kids and our city is Algebra for All. Beginning in 20XX, every school in this city will offer algebra to their students as a central part of their preparation for high school and for life. "ensuring that all children can complete 4 years of high school math by ensuring that they have the access and support they need to complete algebra no later than 9th grade." After discussing with the experts, we are concerned that a singular focus on algebra on 8th grade is unrealistic and unproductive for us. (?????)

We won't relegate ANY of our kids to dreaming about aiming and achieving high—starting in middle school, we'll show them. We have already committed to getting 100,000 kids internships, mentorships, and summer jobs by 2025—including our most vulnerable children in foster homes and shelter. We are doubling down on that today: every middle and high school will have a business partner [EXPLAIN WHAT THIS IS/DOES].

These middle years can also be tremendously hard for many kids, and for their families—to this day I often say I'm a former Recovering-Middle School Parent. All this ambition, all these skills, will take root if and only if our kids are socially and emotionally ready for these experiences, and what's to come with the rigors of high school. And that's not easy for a lot of our kids, who are battling tough situations at home, or among their friends, or just with the difficulties of growing up.

My wife, Chirlane, has been deeply focused on the mental health needs of our kids. She's working with the Administration to revolutionize how we deal with mental health in this city, especially for those with the greatest need and the fewest options. You'll hear a lot more about that in the near future.

These battles can interfere with learning. And we are determined, as a City, to break down all barriers to learning so children come to school ready to succeed. We must fulfill our children's basic prerequisites to learning, accounting for mental and physical health, family stability and support, financial hurdles, and more. Community Schools are the bedrock of these efforts, and this month marks the moment when every last one of the 130 schools we have targeted completes its transformation into a Community School.

Time is passing: it's 3:30pm, and a tenth grader runs her fingers over the pages of her English Language Arts workbook. As a recent immigrant, she needs to pass the English Regents to graduate—so the school staff has created this extended learning period for her and the 15 other English Language Learners in the class. There's a little tap on her back, and our student turns to find a small folded-up piece of paper on the floor right next to her chair. (Some things never change. . .like passing notes in class.) She catches out of the corner of her eye a friend and fellow student grinning. She unfolds the note and reads: “Computer Lab before 2nd period tomorrow?”

Before we think about the computer lab tomorrow, let’s think about where our students are right now. Extended learning time—an extra hour of instruction each day—is a hallmark of our 94 Renewal Schools. These 94 schools are those that have struggled the most to serve their students and families and provide a solid education to our children. So we are rolling out sweeping reforms that touch every part of those schools—transforming the classrooms and the culture to turn the tables of history for the school and its community. In addition to extra class time, Renewal Schools [XYZ DETAILS HERE OF THINGS THEY OFFER].

And it’s working. [UPDATE WITH MOST RECENT STATS/STORIES OF HOW RENEWAL SCHOOLS ARE WORKING:

- Old info test scores are up in 2015 (0.6% in Math, 1.2% in English)
- Attendance - a leading indicator for academic improvements - improved year over year at 56 Renewal Schools.
 - Individual schools saw tremendous gains, such as an 8.1% improvement at Multicultural High School and a 4.6% improvement at JHS 022*

For too long, we haven’t even given students the chance to aim high in high school, because they haven’t been offered the chance to do advanced work—a chance that we know, when taken, correlates with success. You can’t shoot for the moon if there’s no rocket to take you there.

That ends today. Today we offer every high schooler the chance to aim and achieve high. We are introducing AP for All: bringing Advanced Placement classes to every high school by 20XX. Students who take AP classes later excel. .

In a study of students in Texas, those who took AP courses were twice as likely to graduate college in 5 year as compared to their peers who did not, with even more significant gains in minority and low-income populations. While passing an AP exam has a stronger correlation with college success, even exposure to the material can have a lasting impact; students who sat for an AP exam and only received a score of 1-2 (of 5) graduated college at a higher rate than their peers who did not take AP exams at all. On state assessments, Renewal Schools saw modest gains in ELA (1.2%) and math (0.6%)

- Percent proficient improved at every grade level for ELA
- Percent proficient improved at every grade level for math, except 8th grade There was also a citywide decline in 8th grade
- Biggest gains in 3rd grade – 3.5% increase in ELA, 4.3% increase in math
- 26 schools had score increases in both subjects, 25 in just one, and 12 had a decrease in both subjects

Graduation is projected to have a small uptick

- Preliminary data will be available this fall
 - Official data will be available in December
- 72 schools had an increase in attendance (vs. last year)

- Overall, Renewal School attendance increased 1.3%
- Percent of chronically absent students decreased 3.0%

Suspensions decreased at all grade levels in Renewal Schools, and at a more dramatic rate than citywide

- Grades K-8 suspensions decreased 54.9% (vs a 24.8% decrease citywide)
- Grades 9-12 suspensions decreased 39.2% (vs a 12.2% decrease citywide)

Dangerous incidents decreased

- 17 schools had a Persistently Dangerous designation in 2014-15 Just 8 retained their designation for 2015-16

Teachers are more confident in the direction of their schools

- Average teacher attendance improved in 60 schools
- 66% of teachers wouldn’t want to work in any other school (vs 58% last year)
- 71% of teachers would recommend this school to parents (vs 62% last year)

Renewal School parents are engaging with their child’s school

And now, back to that computer lab. Both computer equipment and Computer Science training is a novelty for many students and teachers, including those at nearly all of our Renewal Schools. Fewer than 5% of all NYC public school students have an opportunity to learn Computer Science, and those that do are clustered in just a few high-performing schools.

This is not sustainable for students or for our city, which increasingly needs more people with the computer proficiency to power all kinds of companies, from tech to finance to health to fashion. Hundreds of thousands of good jobs will be accessible to those with computer science skills, and beyond the reach of those without them.

That is why we are immensely proud to announce today the launch of Computer Science for All, which will provide a computer science education to every single public school student within ten years through an $81 million public-private partnership between the City of New York and CSNYC.

This is the largest effort to expand computer science in the country. It will make New York the first-largest school district in the nation to provide computer science to every student—and the first City to invest in the future of its students and its economy in this pioneering way.

Now it's 5pm. A recent graduate comes home from her summer job. She's done it—the days and nights of hard work, struggles and ultimately victories have earned her admission to college [CUNY?]. Money is tight for her, as it is for so many New Yorkers. So maybe she's working at a fast food restaurant, or cleaning hotel rooms to get by. She arrives home to a letter from her university. It's her fall semester reading list. Total price of textbooks: $600. She freezes.

Each year, 20,000 of the City's high school graduates do not enter college. They fall victim to the phenomenon of “summer melt,” where their ability or confidence to begin college in September simply melts away due to unexpected or onerous expenses, or paperwork, or simply uncertainty about how it could all possibly work.

But WE are here to declare that neither finances, fear, nor the unfamiliar will be a barrier to education and a life of success for our children. And our work to break down these barriers will not stop at high school graduation.

We are giving our students every support they need – including financial help for the things both in plain sight and hiding in the shadows, like textbooks.

We're doubling down on mentoring and advisement. [YMI, HS counselors? NEED MORE INFO ON COLLEGE-GOING CULTURE AND MINDSET INTERVENTIONS]. Readiness isn't just an academic state of mind or set of skills.

Comment [LE8]: More info coming soon.

And we are establishing for every child a college savings account, putting aside $50 for every child put aside the moment they enter our education system. [DETAILS]. This would transform the experience of our student confronted with hundreds of dollars in books. She wouldn't be cowed. She wouldn't freeze. She'd know it's there, and she's draw on her savings account and buy her books.

Comment [JD9]: What would this eventually accrue to?

The sun is behind the skyline and it's 8:30pm. After a morning spent at a part-time job and classes all afternoon and into the evening, a college sophomore enters the subway and carefully puts away her Metrocard. At the right stop, she runs up the stairs and greets her study group inside a public library. They've ridden the train stations all over the City in order to be able to meet in one place and study for the next day's exam.

Right now, 17,000 students of our students who begin college do not finish—an unacceptable situation. Sometimes it's because of thing as basic as not being able to afford transportation to class.

Our student got her Metrocard through a CUNY program called ASAP. ASAP kids are given the support they need to succeed in this and every dimension. They receive Metrocard to get to class. They are given a designated cohort of students to travel with through the four years so peers can lift each other up.

We know it works: [EVIDENCE]. And it is now a national model, replicated in places like [XYZ].

That's why are investing to enroll 7 times as many students over the next four years. [3500 enrolled in FY15 vs 25,000 enrolled in FY19]. [MORE METRICS/DESCRIPTION/TIMELINE]

FLESH OUT: And we're introducing new interventions to battle the mindset and paperwork and overwhelm of being in college. These include improving advisement/mentoring – mindset interventions, Low-cost reminders to help stay on top of academic career – text messages, emails, helping kids reapply for FAFSA.

The night ends, the sun rises, and it's 8 a.m. the next day. A college senior grabs her buzzing phone off the kitchen table. It's lighting up with text messages from her mother, her single shepherd, the manager at the internship she just finished – and all the messages are variations on “Go get ‘em!”

She smiles and puts the phone in her purse, then turns to face her reflection in a mirror. She smooths her lapels, takes a deep breath, and catches the elevator right before the doors close. She's on the way out the door for a job interview.

That isn't, of course where the story ends. We hope, of course, that our student gets that job. But we know if she doesn't, she's got the resilience and fortitude to go on another interview, and another after that. We've done right by her by instilling not just the knowledge she needs, but the tools, confidence and belief in herself to share that knowledge with the world, seize opportunities, and achieve success. That's how education in New York City has to work.

In other words: we must and will show each of our kids we believe in their ability to excel. . .

And give them the opportunity to show us we're right.

OPEN QUESTIONS:

- Are we committing to increase the number of CTE programs?
 - CTE students are more likely to graduate high school than their non CTE student counterparts – and have better outcomes for young male students of color
- ~~Where to put accountability piece?:~~
 - ~~Be accountable for the journey and the destination.~~
 - ~~Schools are accountable to us not just for test scores and grad rates, but for the rigorous instruction, collaborative teachers, supportive environments, strong family community ties, effective school leaders, and trust that improve those scores and rates.~~
 - ~~We — City leaders, school leaders, teachers, parents — are all accountable to our students.~~
 - ~~We (gov't) are accountable to New Yorkers for our schools' overall successes and difficulties alike.~~
 - ~~We are giving more information for parents and all NYers on how schools are doing, where they need help, what that help looks like.~~

Excellent.

Does it work if we handle the blog with huff post
I will do one also.. so we increase potential real estate..

And my thought is we then post the two blogs, and connect to the live stream on Thursday

Let me know if any problems with that, or who we should navigate with
....

And does mayor have a blog account on huff?

JDC is working on the charters bit separately and we will plug that in as well shortly.

I think we should end at high school graduation meaning we take out the college textbooks and CUNY ASAP vignette and associated stuff and write a different ending (tear) saving that college and job intvw for the next hit. I can prep a version in that fashion and have both ready.

Thoughts?

Education Vision 2015: Updated September 8, 2015

Equity and Excellence: Every Student, Every Day

Last Wednesday, 1.1 million children put another New York City summer behind them and started the school year.

Could you feel that tidal wave of emotion crash over the whole City, as it always does on that first day? So much joy, excitement, trepidation abounded on sidewalks, in school hallways and lobbies, in cars and buses and trains ferrying families to school in neighborhoods from the South Bronx to the South Shore.

Chirlane and I know those emotions well. Actually, this September is the first in 17 years we haven't been among the public school parents waving goodbye at the entrance. . .swallowing an ocean of feelings as Dante or Chiara walked away into the school year.

We know that families of every kind, in all our city's neighborhoods, share these first-day feelings. But, for many, the common experience of education stops there.

Maybe, once all the parents finally left, a teacher in one school took his new charges to tour a gleaming greenhouse, while a few miles away another was forced to shuffle desks so the leaky roof overhead wouldn't drip down on students.

Maybe in one classroom, students were the first to crack open the latest edition of a classic novel; while across town, it was two students to a tattered old copy, its spine nearly broken from decades of use.

One set of kids is no more deserving of a greenhouse or a falling-apart book than any other. Each is owed the opportunity to have their future determined by hard work and unique talents, as it should be.

But too many of our children's economic futures will be defined by the economic pasts of their neighborhoods. This status quo is unacceptable, un-American, and unfaithful to the legacy and to the promise of New York City.

Comment [LE1]: Thought we were going to take this out, given the inaccuracy of it? Can we focus on inequity of outcomes and not of physical building and supplies?

We all have a stake in its change. As taxpayers, we all pay for public school. As Americans, its value is entrenched in our moral DNA. We've inherited a belief so strong it's almost biological: that this land's richness and riches derive from the success of its people—and this success is available to anyone who puts in the time and the sweat to earn it. Success is not the privilege of a few, but the right of all.

Public education is mandated by law because it is how this core American value should come to life. It's obvious and it's inevitable, it's what makes this country great: our children must go to school, there will always be a school for them to go to, and that school can be a springboard to success for each child.

In other words, our schools must be built on a foundation of both equity and excellence. These principles need to operate hand in hand as the twin engines of our city's large and powerful education system.

We have so much to be proud of—there are so many schools and so many kids who express the city's commitment to equity and excellence each day. In fact, we literally have some of the best students in the country. On a national scale, New York City's children academically outperform than their counterparts in eight of the country's 10 biggest cities. Our low-income students are the highest-performing of all 10 cities. And the one city that outpaces us by a couple of measures is San Diego – a district with one-tenth the students and 5x the funding for each one. Our kids have an awe-inspiring ability to do more with less.

Comment [LE2] : San Diego has 135,000 kids. Not sure where the 5X funding came from Comment [KB3] : Possible to verify actual proportions here?

To fully appreciate the achievements of today's educators and students, we must also take a moment to see how far we've come. . .and the hard work of our predecessors who enabled reforms in the school system that spurred much of this progress. The Bloomberg Administration's successful fight for Mayoral Control of the Schools paved the way for the record-breaking graduating class of 2014 (the last we have final numbers for as we anxiously await 2015 data in the coming weeks).

Comment [LE4] : We won't have this till December.

More than 51,000 students graduated high school in 2014, reflecting the highest graduation rate in the city's history—and 17,000 more students walking across the stage than a decade ago. The class of 2014 also had the fewest dropouts than any other since NYC started keeping records—9,000 less than ten years ago.

And—this is a less scientific but no less meaningful measure—the great majority of the city’s students and parents like their schools.

Clearly, the city is blessed with smart, hardworking, dedicated and determined children, parents, and educators. Together, they write success stories that transform lives and lift up communities.

There simply have not been enough of those success stories. And too often, those there are emanate from the same neighborhoods—neighborhoods where the school roof doesn’t leak, and the books shine like the glass of the greenhouse. Our education system has been rife with division, and students have paid the price.

Comment [LE5] : See comment above.

The Tale of Two Cities in our schools is unacceptable. But we believe it is NOT inevitable. And we came to City Hall to undo it. [this could use more]

Our vision for the city’s public schools is anchored by a fundamental belief in our children – in every child. We won’t choose among our children who will succeed and who will not.

We believe that every student has both the right and the ability to awaken their minds to the world, to set forth on their journey with the skills, courage and confidence to reach their full potential. Every child can grow into a successful adult—ready for college, ready for life—if their education gives them the right tools.

Over the past 18 months, we have forged those tools. They are powerful instruments of equity and excellence, for our schools and for our students—every day, every step of the way.

Let there be no mistake: the “way” I speak of leads to and includes college.

I often say that education determines economic destiny more now than at any point in human history. Nowhere is that clearer than when looking at the way a life veers towards success when a person completes college. An adult with only a HS diploma is almost three times as likely to be in poverty in NYC as someone with a bachelor's degree or higher, and earns $1.1 million less over the course of a lifetime. [Source: CEO]

And our success as a 21st century global city depends on readying students for success in higher education. Our children are counting on us, but we are counting on THEM to keep New York the most competitive city in the world.

In just five years, two-thirds [65% -- NEED HARD #] of NYC jobs are projected to require some college. [Source: CEO]. For generations, our workforce has been made up of the brightest minds from all over the world, drawn like magnets to the greatest city on earth. That attraction shows no sign of letting up, nor do we want it to, in order to keep the innovative and international flavor that makes us great. But we need more talent, and we need to grow it right here at home.

So: we have set three connected goals around higher education to lift up more of our children and meet the needs of a growing, thriving city.

First, we're going to graduate more kids. Right now, 20,000 students who begin high school in New York City each year do not finish. We do not accept that. We are setting in motion changes so that ten years from now, 9,000 more students will graduate within four years. That will bring us to an 80% graduation rate by 2026. Think of it in context of the all the second graders everywhere in the city, hard at work at this moment—over ten percent more of them will collect their high school diploma.

Comment [KB6]: Do we need to say this or is it assumed? It's a bit confusing so would like to strike unless necessary to demarcate 4 year from 6 year grads

Comment [LE7]: Not necessarily assumed. And to be factually accurate – some of our 9,000 will be students who do graduate today, but do it in 5 or 6 years

Second, we will make more of those diplomas carry graduates to and through college. Right now, fewer than half [48%] of our high school graduates are college-ready— meaning they truly have the skills to absorb the material taught in a college course. And in nearly half of our high schools [41%?], fewer than 10% of the graduating class is actually ready for college by these standards.

Comment [LE8]: 34% of high schools have less than 10% college readiness. 56% of high schools have less than 20%

Think about that for a moment. Almost half our schools essentially graduate kids who will find college frustrating, alienating, and probably “not for them” simply because they can’t understand what they are being taught in college. Their only university path would include remedial work, which adds time and expense to the college journey that many of these students just don’t have.

And in a day and age when a college degree is the ticket to a good job, a pathway to the middle class and the most important determining factor to lifelong economic security—we cannot allow this status quo to continue.

So our college readiness goal is two-fold. First of all, we will take the number of public high school graduates who are ready for college from fewer than half [48%, 25,735] to two-thirds (65%) by 2025 – fully 34,000 every year.

Second, we will make sure that every single high school in New York City is capable of graduating college-ready students. No longer will families worry that graduation is simply a seal of approval on the 15 years of the past, as opposed to a real promise for the future.

Excellence will not be portioned out for the lucky few. All our schools will be equitably served to lift up all our children.

Today I will clarify the vision of how we get there.

We are of course already hard at work, and in 18 months we’ve made some tremendous strides. We’ve planned, funded, and rolled out full-day, high-quality, universal pre-k, as well as an unprecedented expansion of after-school programming for middle schoolers. Test scores are up for the second consecutive year, and the first full year on our watch.

More efforts are underway than what’s covered in the news, and we’ll shine a light on them today. Still others you will hear about for the very first time. And as I share the work we are doing, so too will I illustrate the ideas that animate it—the ideas that underpin an equitable and excellent school system for every child.

We will start from a fundamental place: how the City works with those who teach our children. We have redefined this relationship, premised on the belief that we must work with educators, not against them. We must value their expertise and show respect for the work they do every day. We must work harder to retain our teaching talent. And, crucially, we must grow that talent by giving all our educators the training and development they need to deepen their skills.

This professional development is a cornerstone of our reforms in every grade, and something the Chancellor—who started as a rookie teacher and has had nearly every level of job in our public education system since—speaks about with particular passion. She believes that the best way to deepen teachers’ skills is to spread what works—connecting the whole education system so educators can lift each other up, with veteran educators spreading the practices that spur success to fellow teachers and principals.

Our goal is to make sure there ARE more veteran educators to do this in the years ahead. So we are laying the groundwork now to create more expert teachers for the future, who will in turn pay forward the wisdom and skills they acquired from those who taught them.

Certainly, the vast majority of our educators are talented, passionate, and deeply dedicated to their students and schools. There are, however, some teachers in our schools who should be in a learning environment. And those teachers will not remain there. We fundamentally believe in making the change that’s necessary to help schools succeed, and that has already driven us to remove 700+ teachers. In other cases, we will replace school leadership or transform a school itself if they cannot improve with our tailored and targeted support.

And working with our teachers, we have created several schools—PROSE Schools—that are not beholden to labor work rules, and therefore have the unique freedom to “color outside the lines.” We will take the most successful elements of these experiments in school administration and teaching and look hard at ways to bring them to other schools. . .allowing more educators to break through formerly impenetrable boundaries in the service of helping kids learn better.

- Be accountable for the journey and the destination.

- Schools are accountable to us not just for test scores and graduation rates, but for the rigorous instruction, collaborative teachers, supportive environments, strong family-community ties, effective school leaders, and trust that improve those scores and rates.
- We—City leaders, school leaders, teachers, parents—are all accountable to our students.
- We (gov't) are accountable to New Yorkers for our schools' overall successes and difficulties alike.
- We are giving more information for parents and all NYers on how schools are doing, where they need help, what that help looks like.

Framework for Great Schools. If you want to say more, we can say that the new School Quality Snapshots, which will replace the report cards and the single letter grade, are coming out in October. Of course, we know that no two schools and no two children need the same support in order to excel. The unique chemistry of every single school means that each needs a different set of supports to offer the best for its students. And each child will travel his or her own academic, social, and emotional journey. We can't, in the interest of wholesale success, sell education wholesale to all students. They're not our customers. They're our children.

Comment [LE9]: Will wait for next turn to comment on these adds.

That's why we have committed to going beyond academic matters to address the full slate of issues that really engineer success. The cornerstone of this is our Community Schools initiative – 130 schools across the city that support the needs of the whole child. Community Schools ~~might~~ provide counseling services so students have a safe place to share her struggles and successes alike. They offer free vision exams and glasses so kids can see the blackboard. They might have a food pantry so hunger doesn't distract from learning. They might offer English classes for families so parents can help kids with their homework.

And Community Schools are modeling communication and continuity within the school walls and outside them. These practices have inspired an idea that will directly connect more families across the city with the people and places that define a student's educational journey, and bring us one step closer to ending the era of families ricocheting around inside a mammoth bureaucracy.

We are piloting a program to give the children and families who need it most their own strong, supportive hand —to guide them in the long term through the landscape of teachers and tests, to help clear the tough hurdles and celebrate strong successes, and—most of all—to chart and clarify a path to high school graduation..

In one year, every single 6th through 12th grader in two of our most struggling neighborhoods and school districts—Mott Haven and Melrose in the South Bronx’s District 7, and Brownsville in Brooklyn’s District 23, will have their first meeting with their Personal Counselor. This will be the first of dozens of encounters between students and counselors along the journey. The Shepherd won’t simply implore students to keep their eyes on the prize, but actually show them how to get there.

Comment [LE10]: Can we propose a new name?

Comment [LE11]: Can we be a little more explicit? This counselor will follow a student – and their family – from middle school through high school graduation and college enrollment

Let’s imagine a few points on that journey for some of our children, across the city, over the course of their day.

Comment [LE12]: A note for continuity’s sake, you talk about the journey above – which starts in 6th grade for a student and their counselor – and then transition to talking about 4-year olds.

We’ll start first thing in the morning. It’s 8am, and a four year-old is intently focused on building a tower of blocks, stacking carefully as her classmates play behind her – some singing with a teacher, some drawing early masterpieces, some gazing at beginner books. It’s a lively and alive place, filled with the sounds and colors that awaken young children to the world.

This is the critical moment where success begins. We fundamentally believe all children must start their education earlier so they are poised to reap the benefits of kindergarten – and everything that comes after.

I’ll repeat what I’ve said before: we cannot get education right if we do not get it right from the beginning. I’m very proud that last week, we started getting it right for 70,000 of our kids, who began our free, universal, high-quality pre-K. Block towers are rising all across this great city.

Comment [LE13]: Check this number.

Around the same time, across town, a second grader rides the bus to school with a parent, proudly showing off the book the class has been reading—explaining what it’s about and which character she played in a class activity yesterday. Her parent smiles and plays along—the second grader doesn’t know that yesterday her parent and her teacher actually spoke about it on the phone. The teacher called for a few minutes just to let her know that the student did a great job, and share an update on her reading progress.

It's nearly impossible to overemphasize the value of these kinds of interactions—both the simple phone call from teacher to parent, and that moment of sharing between child and parent. Parents are the first and last teachers of children, and must be our partners in everything we do.

That's why we knocked on thousands of doors this summer to make sure families knew what to expect in the year ahead. It's why we instituted an unprecedented 40 minutes of teacher time dedicated solely to connecting with parents. Maybe this is the time during which our imaginary teacher made her phone call to share this news. . .this news which is so prized not just by the family, but to all of us and all our educators.

One second grader's proud announcement that he or she read lines in a class activity reflects a milestone of epic proportion in that child's life: literacy. Reading is the very baseline of lifelong success. It is the foundation of learning in all subjects, of course, and for academic achievement, but it's worth so much more. Reading is how our kids explore the world and learn to think about it. It makes them engaged with society and equips them with the tools to change it. Reading is the key.

And so we are introducing a reading specialist to every single elementary school in the City to help struggling readers get—and stay—on track. The conventional standard is to measure literacy at the end of 3rd grade, but our goal is to have every single second-grader reading. We want as many children as possible to walk into their third grade classroom, pick a book off the shelf, and go to town.

This may sound ambitious. But waiting till the third-grade year may be too late for some kids: a risk we are not willing to take. It's too important and the stakes are too high.

The research is in: students who are not reading proficiently by the end of third grade are four times more likely to drop out of high school than proficient readers.

Comment [LE14]: Many schools already have reading specialists. We are adding a new specialist to every single elementary school, who will focus primarily on second grade literacy. And we will start with those schools that have had the greatest challenges historically.

Comment [LE15]: Would add something to the effect of – By 4th grade, texts in all academic subjects will be incomprehensible to a student who is not reading at grade level. It is more than just a literacy challenge at that point; it becomes a total learning challenge.

Comment [KB16]: Do we have research showing how/why specialists are so effective?

Comment [LE17]: Will pull something together; may not be possible for today.

Conversely, students above grade level for reading in third grade graduate and enroll in college at higher rates than students at or below grade level.

So we don't shy away from ambitious standards that provide the foundation for success. Aiming high is one of our core principles—and simply part of who we are. New York has the most rigorous curriculum standards and administers the toughest tests in the nation. We expect everyone to embrace this aim for excellence, translate it into specific ambitions, and transform those ambitions into achievement.

And a word about how those tests fit into the broader picture. Yes, they are tough. But we treat tests as an important thing, not THE important thing. Tests only tell you that you need to improve and where that improvement is needed—not how to get it done. That's where committed and talented teachers are necessary for success—where teachers like the one our second grader has makes all the difference.

In fact, it's our reading specialists, together with teachers, who will measure and manage progress of our second graders—not another high-stakes test.

Let's turn back to the world of our students. A few hours later, it's noon, and an eighth grader is hunched over an algebra book in the library. She finally solves $A^2 + B^2 = C^2$, sits back in wonder, and glances up at the clock to see how many minutes are left till her advisory session, when she can tell her adviser how hard it was—and how it feels to finally get it.

Our student been struggling with a lot of anger, frustration, and sadness this year, and her adviser's office has been her sanctuary. They talk for half an hour, and then the adviser sends our student home with a family permission form to participate in a big day next week: a college tour. She'll be the first in her family to see the inside of a college classroom.

Middle school is a deeply important time. It's when an actual vision of success as an adult—college, a career—can come into focus. . .if we show it to our students. We are going to show them, and we are going to prepare them so that every middle school student is socially, emotionally, and academically ready for high school, and exposed to college by the time they enter 9th grade.

First, College Access for All will come to our schools. The “All” here actually includes students AND families, for whom we are making college real, tangible, and accessible by equipping their schools with the resources they need to create a truly “college-going culture.”

By 20XX, every middle and high school student will have the chance to visit an NYC college, parents will be attending workshops on how to afford it, mentorships will connect public school students with those already enrolled in college, and more.

Comment [LE18]: Need 3-5 years, if we are being conservative.

Comment [LE19]: Would NOT restrict to NYC college only.

Comment [LE20]: This is something many charter networks – and many individual schools in NYC – do, so we would not be first. We would be the biggest system to support it for all schools and all students.

Second, we won’t relegate ANY of our kids to dreaming about aiming and achieving high—starting in middle school, we’ll show them. We have already committed to getting 100,000 kids internships, mentorships, and summer jobs by 2025—including our most vulnerable children in foster homes and shelter. We are doubling down on that today: every middle and high school will have a business partner [EXPLAIN WHAT THIS IS/DOES].

This is the line I suggested over email - Every student will have the opportunity to go on college visits in middle school and high school, and to participate in other activities with their family to prepare for college – having key discussions about how to pay for college, receiving support with applications and financial aid forms, and meeting college admissions counselors

Third, we have zeroed in on one of the key skills that students need to stay on pace to get to college: algebra. Research shows it [WHAT ARE THE IMPROVEMENTS?], but students at lower-performing schools have been locked out of this because the schools do not offer it. But that’s in the past. The future for our kids and our city is Algebra for All.

Comment [KB21]: Are we the first to do this?

Comment [LE22]: Work in progress.

Beginning in 20XX, we will expand algebra across middle and high schools so that every student completes algebra by the end of 9th grade and can move on to the more advanced high school math that will ready them for college

Comment [LE23]: We could start next fall with a targeted Algebra expansion in middle schools with underserved kids who are ready for the coursework. Teacher PD could start as soon as spring 2016 with the right resources in place

These middle years can also be tremendously hard for many kids, and for their families—to this day I often say I’m a Recovering Middle School Parent. All this ambition, all these skills, will take root if and only if our kids are socially and emotionally ready for these experiences, and what’s to come with the rigors of high school. And that’s not easy for a lot of our kids, who are battling tough situations at home, or among their friends, or just with the difficulties of growing up.

My wife, Chirlane, has been deeply focused on the mental health needs of our kids. She's working with the Administration to revolutionize how we deal with mental health in this city, especially for those with the greatest need and the fewest options. You'll hear a lot more about that in the near future.

These battles can interfere with learning. And we are determined, as a City, to break down all barriers to learning so children come to school ready to succeed. We must fulfill our children's basic prerequisites to learning, accounting for mental and physical health, family stability and support, financial hurdles, and more. Community Schools are the bedrock of these efforts, and this month marks the moment when every last one of the 130 schools we have targeted completes its transformation into a Community School.

Time is passing: it's 3:30pm, and a tenth grader runs her fingers over the pages of her English Language Arts workbook. As a recent immigrant, she needs to pass the English Regents to graduate—so the school staff has created this extended learning period for her and the 15 other English Language Learners in the class. There's a little tap on her back, and our student turns to find a small folded-up piece of paper on the floor right next to her chair. (Some things never change. . .like passing notes in class.) She catches out of the corner of her eye a friend and fellow student grinning. She unfolds the note and reads: "Computer Lab before 2nd period tomorrow?"

Before we think about the computer lab tomorrow, let's think about where our students are right now. Extended learning time—an extra hour of instruction each day—is a hallmark of our 94 Renewal Schools. These 94 schools are those that have struggled the most to serve their students and families and provide a solid education to our children. So we are rolling out sweeping reforms that touch every part of those schools—transforming the classrooms and the culture to turn the tables of history for the school and its community.

In addition to extra class time, Renewal School students are seeing bigger, better libraries. New writing programs. Educators are receiving extra professional development, especially around that new writing curricula and STEM teaching. We have a dynamite team, led by Aimee Horowitz, that is dedicated to implementing these changes and lifting up these schools.

Comment [LE24]: Not to mess with speech writing where I am out of my depth ... but ... didn't we do a bit on Community Schools already?

And it's working. Attendance - a leading indicator for academic improvements - went up at 72 of the 94 Renewal Schools, and suspensions are dramatically down. The number of schools classified as Persistently Dangerous has been cut by more than half. Test scores overall are up in 2015 (0.6% in Math, 1.2% in English). Individual schools saw tremendous gains, such as an 8.1% improvement at Multicultural High School and a 4.6% improvement at JHS 022*. And when graduation data comes in this fall, we expect to see that it's gone up.

Teachers are more confident in the direction of their schools—fully two-thirds say they wouldn't want to work in any other school, a jump from last year. And Renewal School parents are engaging with their child's school: almost 7 out of 10 families communicated with their child's teacher at least once a month, with more than half meeting in person at a parent-teacher conference on a monthly basis.

And—this is a big one—more than a quarter of Renewal School parents volunteered to support their child's school at least once a month last year. This is time out a life likely filled to the brim with work, childcare, or schooling of their own. It shows that parents are understanding the impact only they can have in a school community, and how that lifts up everyone—including their own child—higher than they ever thought.

For too long, we haven't even given students the chance to aim high in high school, because they haven't been offered the chance to do advanced work—a chance that we know, when taken, correlates with success. You can't shoot for the moon if there's no rocket to take you there.

That ends today. Today we offer every high schooler the chance to aim and achieve high. We are introducing AP for All: bringing Advanced Placement classes to every high school by 2022~~XX~~. This builds on the work of our AP Expansion program, which has brought new AP courses to over 70 high schools in NYC. It's been shown that overall, students who take AP classes were twice as likely to graduate college in 5 year as compared to their peers who did not. Among

Comment [LE25]:

- We are on track to transition all Renewal Schools to Community Schools
 - All 94 schools have been matched with a Community Based Organization (CBO)
 - 72 of 94 Community School Directors have been hired
 - 31,197 of 38,000 homes visited through door-knocking campaign
 - 93 of 94 mental health assessments completed

Comment [LE26]: BE VERY CAREFUL HERE - the individual gains refer to attendance, NOT test scores.

Comment [RB27]: Do we have comparative data?

Comment [LE28]: 25% citywide. We didn't ask this exact question last year, so I don't have a year over year for Renewals.

minority and low-income populations, they were X times as likely. Simple exposure to the material can have a lasting impact; students who sat for an AP exam and only received a score of 1-2 (of 5) graduated college at a higher rate than their peers who did not take AP exams at all.

Comment [LE29] : Will find this stat

And now, back to that computer lab. Both computer equipment and Computer Science training is a novelty for many students and teachers, including those at nearly all of our Renewal Schools. Fewer than 5% of all NYC public school students have an opportunity to learn Computer Science, and those that do are clustered in just a few high-performing schools.

This is not sustainable for students or for our city, which increasingly needs more people with the computer proficiency to power all kinds of companies, from tech to finance to health to fashion. Hundreds of thousands of good jobs will be accessible to those with computer science skills, and beyond the reach of those without them.

That is why we are immensely proud to announce today the launch of Computer Science for All, which will provide a computer science education to every single public school student within ten years through an $81 million public-private partnership between the City of New York and CSNYC.

This is the largest effort to expand computer science in the country. It will make New York the largest school district in the nation to provide computer science to every student—and the first City to invest in the future of its students and its economy in this pioneering way.

Now it's 5pm. A recent graduate comes home from her summer job. She's done it—the days and nights of hard work, struggles and ultimately victories have earned her admission to college [CUNY?]. Money is tight for her, as it is for so many New Yorkers. So maybe she's working at a fast food restaurant, or cleaning hotel rooms to get by. She arrives home to a letter from her university. It's her fall semester reading list. Total price of textbooks: $600. She freezes.

Each year, 20,000 of the City's high school graduates do not enter college. They fall victim to the phenomenon of "summer melt," where their ability or confidence to begin college in September simply melts away due to unexpected or onerous expenses, or paperwork, or simply uncertainty about how it could all possibly work.

But WE are here to declare that neither finances, fear, nor the unfamiliar will be a barrier to education and a life of success for our children. And our work to break down these barriers will not stop at high school graduation.

We are giving our students every support they need – including financial help for the things both in plain sight and hiding in the shadows, like textbooks.

We're doubling down on mentoring and advisement. [YMI, HS counselors? NEED MORE INFO ON COLLEGE-GOING CULTURE AND MINDSET INTERVENTIONS]. Readiness isn't just an academic state of mind or set of skills.

Comment [LE30]: What do you mean here?

And we are establishing for every child a college savings account, putting aside $50 for every child put aside the moment they enter our education system.

[DETAILS]. This would transform the experience of our student confronted with hundreds of dollars in books. She wouldn't be cowed. She wouldn't freeze. She'd know it's there, and she's draw on her savings account and buy her books.

The sun is behind the skyline and it's 8:30pm. After a morning spent at a part-time job and classes all afternoon and into the evening, a college sophomore enters the subway and carefully puts away her Metrocard. At the right stop, she runs up the stairs and greets her study group inside a public library. They've ridden the train stations all over the City in order to be able to meet in one place and study for the next day's exam.

Right now, 17,000 students of our students who begin college do not finish—an unacceptable situation. Sometimes it's because of thing as basic as not being able to afford transportation to class.

Our student got her Metrocard through a CUNY program called ASAP. ASAP kids are given the support they need to succeed in this and every dimension. They receive Metrocard to get to class. They are given a designated cohort of students to travel with through the four years so peers can lift each other up.

We know it works: [EVIDENCE]. And it is now a national model, replicated in places like [XYZ].

That's why we're investing to enroll 7 times as many students over the next four years. [3500 enrolled in FY15 vs 25,000 enrolled in FY19]. [MORE METRICS/DESCRIPTION/TIMELINE]

FLESH OUT: And we're introducing new interventions to battle the mindset and paperwork and overwhelm of being in college. These include improving advisement/mentoring – mindset interventions, Low-cost reminders to help stay on top of academic career – text messages, emails, helping kids reapply for FAFSA.

The night ends, the sun rises, and it's 8 a.m. the next day. A college senior grabs her buzzing phone off the kitchen table. It's lighting up with text messages from her mother, her single shepherd, the manager at the internship she just finished – and all the messages are variations on “Go get ‘em!”

She smiles and puts the phone in her purse, then turns to face her reflection in a mirror. She smooths her lapels, takes a deep breath, and catches the elevator right before the doors close. She's on the way out the door for a job interview.

That isn't, of course where the story ends. We hope, of course, that our student gets that job. But we know if she doesn't, she's got the resilience and fortitude to go on another interview, and another after that. We've done right by her by instilling not just the knowledge she needs, but the tools, confidence and belief in herself to share that knowledge with the world, seize opportunities, and achieve success. That's how education in New York City has to work.

In other words: we must and will show each of our kids we believe in their ability to excel. . .

And give them the opportunity to show us we're right.

I've gone through and revised accordingly. We have charters in there now as well as a couple of comments from Karin.

I am doing a fresh read with all changes and will send around again soon.

All of my edits are in comments.

Please see comment around Renewal School stats – there was some confusion of numbers on attendance gains vs. test score gains and I want to make sure we fix that! Let me know if you are missing numbers you need.

See attached. I am still working in the Framework and accountability stuff (and poverty/inequity point) at the top but want to make sure that from a programmatic perspective I have captured all the updates accurately so please review!

JDC is working on the charters bit separately and we will plug that in as well shortly.

I think we should end at high school graduation meaning we take out the college textbooks and CUNY ASAP vignette and associated stuff and write a different ending (tear) saving that college and job intw for the next hit. I can prep a version in that fashion and have both ready.

Thoughts?

ITEM	TIMELINE	COST (M)	ONE-LINER
Computer Science for All	10 years / by 2025	81.00	Pub-pri partnership bringing computer science to all students in all schools, in every grade (Funded)
Algebra for All	3-5 years	17	Every student will complete Algebra no later than 9 th grade, and will be able to access a four-year math curriculum in high school. As part of this, we will expand the number of middle schools offering Algebra in 8 th grade
AP for All	5-6 years	50	Every high school student has access to a range of STEM and liberal arts AP courses
Single Shepherd – District 7 and 23		15	Every student will be paired with a counselor starting in 6 th grade, who will support them academically and emotionally through high school graduation and college enrollment
Student Progress Pact	4-7 years		Every middle and high schooler has a living contract signed by parents, educators, student outlining path to college
College Tours for Middle and High Schoolers/College Access HS		5	Every student will have the opportunity to go on college visits in middle school and high school, and to participate in other activities with their family to prepare for college – having key discussions about how to pay for college, receiving support with applications and financial aid forms, and meeting college admissions counselors
School Business Partners			Every middle and high school has a business partner (starting with CTE schools and expanding)
2nd Grade Universal Literacy		65	Every 2nd grader will read on grade level, and we will place a reading specialist in every elementary school to ensure universal literacy
College Savings Accounts	13 years		Every public school student will have an account opened when they start Pre-K with $50 in seed funding (Not ready)
ASAP Expansion	5 years (FY19)	42.00	Increase # of ASAP seats seven-fold to 25,000 enrolled by June 2019 -- and increase # of STEM majors w/in program (Funded)
Last-Dollar or Other College Scholarships			Many options
Stuff and Things Tracker Online by Grade			Online tool to see what you "get"/ goals/hallmarks of education by grade

Are we keeping Student Progress Pact in? The cost here will be very high – and I thought we had baked it into Single Shepherd.

Best thing we have going for us is fact that this man is not lazy. Therefore, all we need to do is inject some reality into the world. My mind goes to evidence. Visual evidence of his activity.

For a year and a half we've had the Mayoral Photo Office Twitter account in dry dock.

A few weeks ago Mayor indicated (as I understood it - wld need to confirm) a tolerance for 1 minute of photos "at the top of any meeting".

If that is accurate, we could keep a photog closer to him and shoot the first minute of anything he does and release 1 photo with a time stamp and very straight caption abt the activity.

For ex:

@NYCMayoralPhoto: 9:54 AM: @billdeblasio meets w/ @aliciaglen in Mayor's office re: housing. Mayor committed to 200k add'l units by 2024. (Riffing here. Would be fact checked.)

It would become a kind of pool report/mayoral news wire type product. Our other accounts cld retweet the better stuff.

I like that it creates a record, which we control, of how active the Mayor is.

Thoughts?

Hi Phil,

I caught the tail end of the mayor on Morning Joe before Christie came on and made ridiculous comments that went unchallenged. I'd like to re-extend an invitation for the mayor to appear on my radio show. There are only a few of us on the left who do national shows and we offer a platform that includes about 75 radio stations, Sirius/XM, our app, and online streaming. The power and effectiveness of talk radio is understood and harnessed by conservatives, but I've been trying for years to get more liberals to understand its value.

Can we please arrange an interview?

Best Wishes,

Alan

Best thing we have going for us is fact that this man is not lazy. Therefore, all we need to do is inject some reality into the world. My mind goes to evidence. Visual evidence of his activity.

For a year and a half we've had the Mayoral Photo Office Twitter account in dry dock.

A few weeks ago Mayor indicated (as I understood it - wld need to confirm) a tolerance for 1 minute of photos "at the top of any meeting".

If that is accurate, we could keep a photog closer to him and shoot the first minute of anything he does and release 1 photo with a time stamp and very straight caption abt the activity.

For ex:

@NYCMayoralPhoto: 9:54 AM: @billdeblasio meets w/ @aliciaglen in Mayor's office re: housing. Mayor committed to 200k add'l units by 2024. (Riffing here. Would be fact checked.)

It would become a kind of pool report/mayoral news wire type product. Our other accounts cld retweet the better stuff.

I like that it creates a record, which we control, of how active the Mayor is.

Hi all, thanks for the call today. I'll keep my eyes open for the draft press release later this week so we can provide a quote. As far as the op-ed, we will have to run the idea by the Mayor to gauge interest, but it would be helpful to provide draft text. We can do this whenever there's a draft ready.

Education Vision 2015: Updated September 8, 2015

Equity and Excellence: Every Student, Every Day

Last Wednesday, 1.1 million children put another New York City summer behind them and started the school year.

Could you feel that tidal wave of emotion crash over the whole City, as it always does on that first day? So much joy, excitement, trepidation abounded on sidewalks, in school hallways and lobbies, in cars and buses and trains ferrying families to school in neighborhoods from the South Bronx to the South Shore.

My wife Chirlane and I know those emotions well. Actually, this September is the first in 17 years we haven't been among the public school parents waving goodbye at the entrance. . .swallowing an ocean of feelings as Dante or Chiara walked away into the school year.

We know that families of every kind, in all our city's neighborhoods, share these first-day feelings. But, for many, the common experience of education stops there.

You may not see it from looking at the building roofs, or the books in the library, or the science labs. But if you look deeper, you'll see the differences come into focus

Maybe, once all the parents finally left, a teacher in one school asked the first math question of the day, and a dozen hands shot up across a full classroom.

Maybe a few miles away, another teacher at another school asked the same question but saw a dozen empty desks instead of a dozen hands.

Maybe one of those empty seats belonged to a student who couldn't come to school because a younger sibling was sick, and their parents couldn't afford to miss a day of work. Maybe another was for a student who had an asthma attack that rendered him too weak to get to school that day.

Each child is owed the opportunity to have their future determined by hard work and unique talents, as it should be.

But too often, the poverty and inequity blanketing many of our communities are the decisive force for too many of our kids, and their economic futures will be defined by the economic pasts of their neighborhoods. This status quo is unacceptable, un-American, and unfaithful to the legacy and to the promise of New York City.

We all have a stake in its change. As taxpayers, we all pay for public school. As Americans, its value is entrenched in our moral DNA. We've inherited a belief so strong it's almost biological: that this land's richness and riches derive from the success of its people—and this success is available to anyone who puts in the time and the sweat to earn it. Success is not the privilege of a few, but the right of all.

Public education is mandated by law because it is how this core American value should come to life. It's obvious and it's inevitable, it's what makes this country great: our children must go to school, there will always be a school for them to go to, and that school can be a springboard to success for each child.

In other words, our schools must be built on a foundation of both equity and excellence. These principles need to operate hand in hand as the twin engines of our city's large and powerful education system.

We have so much to be proud of—there are so many schools and so many kids who express the city's commitment to equity and excellence each day. In fact, we literally have some of the best students in the country. On a national scale, New York City's children academically outperform than their counterparts in eight of the country's 10 biggest cities. Our low-income students are the highest-performing of all 10 cities. And the one city that outpaces us by a couple of measures is San Diego – [CONFIRM THIS, AND SHOW RELATIVITY]. Our kids have an awe-inspiring ability to do more with less.

To fully appreciate the achievements of today's educators and students, we must also take a moment to see how far we've come. . .and applaud the hard work of our predecessors who enabled reforms in the school system that spurred much of this progress. The Bloomberg Administration's successful fight for Mayoral Control of the Schools paved the way for the record-breaking graduating class of 2014 (the last class we have final numbers for as we eagerly await 2015 data in the coming months).

More than 51,000 students graduated high school in 2014, reflecting the highest graduation rate in the city's history—and 17,000 more students walking across the stage than a decade ago. The class of 2014 also had the fewest dropouts than any other since NYC started keeping records—9,000 less than ten years ago.

And—this is a less scientific but no less meaningful measure—the great majority of the city's students and parents like their schools.

Clearly, the city is blessed with smart, hardworking, dedicated and determined children, parents, and educators. Together, they write success stories that transform lives and lift up communities.

There simply have not been enough of those success stories. And too often, the success stories emanate from the same neighborhoods. Our education system has been rife with division, and students have paid the price.

The Tale of Two Cities in our schools is unacceptable. But we believe it is NOT inevitable. And we came to City Hall to undo it.

Our vision for the city's public schools is anchored by a fundamental belief in our children – in every child. We won't choose among our children who will succeed and who will not.

That means every child in every public school – whether a charter school, or traditional public school. So today, we're proposing a plan to make it easier for families to apply to charter schools – by including them in our central school enrollment system. For those families, entering a charter lottery would be exactly as easy as applying for a traditional public school. No longer would they be forced to make their way through a separate, sometimes tedious process. Under our plan, every family would list 12 choices for elementary school, in preference order – including both charter and traditional public schools. A child would be matched with the school with available seats that the child’s family ranked highest. It’s a common-sense approach to unlocking more options for every child, no matter what neighborhood or family they come from.

We believe that every student has both the right and the ability to awaken their minds to the world, to set forth on their journey with the skills, courage and confidence to reach their full potential. Every child can grow into a successful adult—ready for college, ready for life—if their education gives them the right tools.

Over the past 18 months, we have expanded and sharpened those tools. They are powerful instruments of equity and excellence, for our schools and for our students—every day, every step of the way.

Let there be no mistake: the “way” I speak of leads to and includes college.

I often say that education determines economic destiny more now than at any point in human history. Nowhere is that clearer than when looking at the way a life veers towards success when a person completes college. An adult with only a HS diploma is almost three times as likely to be in poverty in NYC as someone with a bachelor’s degree or higher, and earns $1.1 million less over the course of a lifetime. [Source: CEO]

And our success as a 21st century global city depends on readying students for success in higher education. Our children are counting on us, but we are counting on THEM to keep New York the most competitive city in the world.

In just five years, two-thirds [65% -- NEED HARD #] of NYC jobs are projected to require some college. [Source: CEO]. For generations, our workforce has been made up of the brightest minds from all over the world, drawn like magnets to the greatest city on earth. That attraction shows no sign of letting up, nor do we want it to, in order to keep the innovative and international flavor that makes us great. But we need more talent, and we need to grow it right here at home.

So: we have set two connected goals around higher education to lift up more of our children and meet the needs of a growing, thriving city.

First, we're going to graduate more kids. Right now, 20,000 students who begin high school in New York City each year do not finish. We refuse accept that status quo. We are setting in motion changes so that ten years from now, 9,000 more students will graduate within four years. That will bring us to an 80% graduation rate by 2026. Think of it in context of all the second graders in the city, hard at work at this moment: over ten percent more of them will collect their high school diploma.

Second, we will make more of those diplomas carry graduates to and through college. Right now, fewer than half [48%] of our high school graduates overall are college-ready— meaning they truly have the skills to absorb the material taught in a college course.

And less than 20% of graduates are ready for college by these standards in more than half of our high schools [56%?].

Think about that for a moment. More than half our schools essentially graduate kids who will find college frustrating, alienating, and probably “not for them” simply because they can't understand what they are being taught. Their only university path would include remedial work, which adds time and expense to the college journey that many of these students just don't have.

And in a day and age when a college degree is the ticket to a good job, a pathway to the middle class and the most important determining factor to lifelong economic security, we cannot allow this status quo to continue.

So our college readiness goal is two-fold. First of all, we will take the number of public high school graduates who are ready for college from fewer than half [48%, 25,735] to two-thirds (65%) by 2025 – fully 34,000 students every year.

And we will make sure that every single high school in New York City is capable of graduating college-ready students. No longer will families worry that graduation is simply a seal of approval on the 15 years of the past, as opposed to a real promise for the future.

Excellence will not be portioned out for the lucky few. All our schools will be equitably served to lift up all our children.

Today I want to describe our vision of how we get there.

We are of course already hard at work, and in 18 months we've made some tremendous strides. We've planned, funded, and rolled out full-day, high-quality, universal pre-k, as well as an unprecedented expansion of after-school programming for middle schoolers. Test scores are up for the second consecutive year, and the first full year on our watch.

More efforts are underway than what's covered in the news, and we'll shine a light on them today. Still others you will hear about for the very first time. And as I share the work we are doing, so too will I illustrate the ideas that animate it—the ideas that underpin an equitable and excellent school system for every child.

We will start from a fundamental place: how the City works with those who teach our children. We have redefined this relationship, premised on the belief that we must work with educators, not against them. We must value their expertise and show respect for the work they do every day. We must work harder to retain our teaching talent. And, crucially, we must grow that talent by giving all our educators the training and development they need to deepen their skills.

This professional development is a cornerstone of our reforms in every grade, and something the Chancellor—who started as a rookie teacher 50 years ago and has had nearly every level of job in our public education system since—speaks about with particular passion. She believes that the best way to deepen teachers' skills is to spread what works—connecting the whole education system so educators can lift each other up, with veteran educators spreading the practices that spur success to fellow teachers and principals.

Our goal is to make sure there ARE more veteran educators to do this in the years ahead. So we are laying the groundwork now to cultivate more expert teachers for the future, who will in turn pay forward the wisdom and skills they acquired from those who taught them.

Certainly, the vast majority of our educators are talented, passionate, and deeply dedicated to their students and schools. There are, however, some teachers in our schools who shouldn't be in a learning environment. And those teachers will not remain there. We fundamentally believe in making the change that's necessary to help schools succeed, and that has already driven us to remove 660 underperforming teachers. In other cases, we will replace school leadership or transform a school itself if they cannot improve with our tailored and targeted support.

And working with our teachers, we have created several schools—PROSE Schools—that are not confined to labor work rules, and therefore have the unique freedom to “color outside the lines.” We will take the most successful elements of these experiments in school administration and teaching and look hard at ways to bring them to other schools. . .allowing more educators to break through formerly impenetrable boundaries in the service of helping kids learn better.

We've embarked on pioneering efforts like PROSE schools because we consider ourselves accountable for our students' journeys and their eventual destination of college or a living-wage career. Schools are accountable to us not just for test scores and grad rates, but for all the things that are proven to get those results. It takes rigorous instruction, collaborative teachers, supportive environments, strong family-community ties, effective school leaders, and a sense of school trust.

These are the criteria that make up our Framework for Great Schools, and what parents will see evaluated in the new School Quality Snapshots, which will be released in October, replacing the old system of school report cards and the single letter grade. This will give more information to parents and all NYers on how schools are doing, where they need help, what that help looks like.

Of course, we know that no two schools and no two children need the same support in order to excel. The unique chemistry of every single school means that each needs a different set of supports to offer the best for its students.

And each child will travel his or her own academic, social, and emotional journey. We can't, in the interest of wholesale success, sell education wholesale to all students. They're not our customers. They're our children.

That's why we have committed to going beyond academic matters to address the full slate of issues that really engineer success. The cornerstone of this is our Community Schools initiative – 130 schools across the city that support the needs of the whole child. Community Schools might provide counseling services so students have a safe place to share their struggles and successes alike. They offer free vision exams and glasses so kids can see the blackboard. They might have a food pantry so hunger doesn't distract from learning. They might offer English classes for families so parents can help kids with their homework.

And Community Schools are modeling communication and continuity within the school walls and outside them. These practices have inspired an idea that will directly connect more families across the city with the people and places that define a student's educational journey, and bring us one step closer to ending the era of families ricocheting around inside a mammoth bureaucracy.

We are piloting a program to give the children and families who need it most their own strong, supportive hand—to guide them over the long term through the landscape of teachers and tests, to help clear the tough hurdles and celebrate strong successes, and—most of all—to chart and clarify a path to high school graduation.

In one year, every single 6th through 12th grader in two of our most struggling neighborhoods and school districts—the South Bronx's District 7, and Central Brooklyn's District 23, will have their first meeting with their Dedicated Counselor. This will be the first of dozens of encounters between students and Counselors along the journey. The Counselor won't simply implore students to keep their eyes on the prize, but actually show them how to get there, following a student and their family through the years to high school graduation and actually enrolling in college.

The best way to make this all come to life is to imagine a few points on the entire educational journey for some of our children, across the city, over the course of their day.

We'll start first thing in the morning. It's 8am, and a four year-old is intently focused on building a tower of blocks, stacking carefully as her classmates play behind her – some singing with a teacher, some drawing early masterpieces, some gazing at beginner books. It's a lively and alive place, filled with the sounds and colors that awaken young children to the world.

This is the critical moment where success begins. We fundamentally believe all children must start their education earlier so they are poised to reap the benefits of Kindergarten – and everything that comes after.

I'll repeat what I've said before: we cannot get education right if we do not get it right from the beginning. I'm very proud that last week, we started getting it right for 70,000 of our kids, who began our free, universal, high-quality pre-K. Block towers are rising all across this great city.

Around the same time, across town, a second grader rides the bus to school with a parent, proudly showing off the book the class has been reading—explaining what it's about and which character she played in a class activity yesterday. Her parent smiles and plays along—the second grader doesn't know that yesterday her parent and her teacher actually spoke about it on the phone. The teacher called for a few minutes just to let her know that the student did a great job, and share an update on her reading progress.

It's nearly impossible to overemphasize the value of these kinds of interactions—both the simple phone call from teacher to parent, and that moment of sharing between child and parent. Parents are the first and last teachers of children, and must be our partners in everything we do.

That's why we knocked on the doors of 35,000 parents this summer to make sure families knew what to expect in the year ahead. It's why we instituted an unprecedented 40 minutes of teacher time dedicated solely to connecting with parents. Maybe this is the time during which our teacher made her phone call to share this news. . .this news which is so prized not just by the family, but to all of us and all our educators.

One second grader's proud announcement that he or she read lines in a class activity reflects a milestone of epic proportion in that child's life: literacy. Reading is the very baseline of lifelong success. It is the foundation of learning in all subjects, of course, and for academic achievement, but it's worth so much more. Reading is how our kids explore the world and learn to think about it. It makes them engaged with society and equips them with the tools to change it. Reading is the key.

And so we are introducing Reach to Reading for All. Every single elementary school in the city will have a reading specialist, focused primarily on helping struggling second-graders get—and stay—on track. The conventional standard is to measure literacy at the end of 3rd grade, but our goal is to have every single second-grader reading. We want as many children as possible to walk into their third grade classroom, pick a book off the shelf, and go to town.

This may sound ambitious. But waiting till the third-grade year may be too late for some kids: a risk we are not willing to take. It's too important and the stakes are too high. By 4th grade, texts in all academic subjects will be incomprehensible to a student who is not reading at grade level. It is more than just a literacy challenge at that point; it becomes a total learning challenge.

And the research of literacy's longer-term effect is in: students who are not reading proficiently by the end of third grade are four times more likely to drop out of high school than proficient readers. Conversely, students above grade level for reading in third grade graduate and enroll in college at higher rates than students at or below grade level.

So we don't shy away from ambitious standards that provide the foundation for success. Aiming high is one of our core principles—and simply part of who we are. New York has the most rigorous curriculum standards and administers the toughest tests in the nation. We expect everyone to embrace this aim for excellence, translate it into specific ambitions, and transform those ambitions into achievement.

And a word about how those tests fit into the broader picture. Yes, they are tough. But we treat tests as an important thing, not THE important thing. Tests only tell you that you need to improve and where that improvement is needed—not how to get it done. That’s where committed and talented teachers are necessary for success—where teachers like the one our second grader has makes all the difference.

In fact, it’s our reading specialists, together with teachers, who will measure and manage progress of our second graders—not another high-stakes test.

Let’s turn back to the world of our students. A few hours later, it’s noon, and an eighth grader is hunched over an algebra book in the library. She finally solves $A^2 + B^2 = C^2$, sits back in wonder, and glances up at the clock to see how many minutes are left till her advisory session, when she can tell her adviser how hard it was—and how it feels to finally get it.

Our student been struggling with a lot of anger, frustration, and sadness this year, and her adviser’s office has been her sanctuary. They talk for half an hour, and then the adviser sends our student home with a family permission form to participate in a big day next week: a college tour. She’ll be the first in her family to see the inside of a college classroom.

Middle school is a deeply important time. It’s when an actual vision of success as an adult—college, a career—can come into focus. . .if we show it to our students. We are going to show them, and we are going to prepare them so that every middle school student is socially, emotionally, and academically ready for high school, and exposed to college by the time they enter 9th grade.

ADDITIONAL LANGUAGE ON AFTER-SCHOOL?

First, College Access for All will come to our schools. The “All” here actually includes students AND families, for whom we are making college real, tangible, and accessible by equipping their schools with the resources they need to create a truly “college-going culture.”

By 2020, every middle and high school student will have the chance to visit a college, families will be attending workshops on how to afford it, and students will be connected to peers already enrolled in college and to college admissions counselors and more. We will be the biggest school system in the nation to support college access for all schools and all students.

NEED TO MOVE TO HIGH SCHOOL ONLY: *Second, we won't relegate ANY of our kids to dreaming about aiming and achieving high—starting in middle school, we'll show them. We have already committed to getting 100,000 kids internships, mentorships, and summer jobs by 2025—including our most vulnerable children in foster homes and shelter. We are doubling down on that today: every school will have a business partner [EXPLAIN WHAT THIS IS/DOES].

Second, we have zeroed in on one of the key skills that students need to stay on pace to get to college: algebra. Research shows it [WHAT ARE THE IMPROVEMENTS?], but students at lower-performing schools have been locked out of this because the schools do not offer it. But that's in the past. The future for our kids and our city is Algebra for All.

Beginning in 2016, we will expand algebra across middle and high schools so that every student completes algebra by the end of 9th grade, and can move on to the more advanced high school math that will ready them for college.

These middle years can be tremendously hard for many kids, and for their families—to this day I often say I'm a Recovering Middle School Parent. All this ambition, all these skills, will take root if and only if our kids are socially and emotionally ready for these experiences, and what's to come with the rigors of high school. And that's not easy for a lot of our kids, who are battling tough situations at home, or among their friends, or just with the difficulties of growing up.

My wife, Chirlane, has been deeply focused on the mental health needs of our kids. She's working with the Administration to revolutionize how we deal with mental health in this city, especially for those with the greatest need and the fewest options. You'll hear a lot more about that in the near future.

These battles can interfere with learning. And we are determined, as a City, to break down all barriers to learning so children come to school ready to succeed. We must fulfill our children's basic prerequisites to learning, accounting for mental and physical health, family stability and support, financial hurdles, and more. Community Schools are the bedrock of these efforts, and this month marks the moment when every last one of the 130 schools we have targeted completes its transformation into a Community School.

Time is passing: it's 3:30pm, and a tenth grader runs her fingers over the pages of her English Language Arts workbook. As a recent immigrant, she needs to pass the English Regents to graduate—so the school staff has created this extended learning period for her and the 15 other English Language Learners in the class. There's a little tap on her back, and our student turns to find a small folded-up piece of paper on the floor right next to her chair. (Some things never change. . .like passing notes in class.) She catches out of the corner of her eye a friend and fellow student grinning. She unfolds the note and reads: "Computer Lab before 2nd period tomorrow?"

Before we think about the computer lab tomorrow, let's think about where our students are right now. Extended learning time—an extra hour of instruction each day—is a hallmark of our 94 Renewal Schools. These 94 schools are those that have struggled the most to serve their students and families and provide a solid education to our children. So we are rolling out sweeping reforms that touch every part of those schools—transforming the classrooms and the culture to turn the tables of history for the school and its community.

In addition to extra class time, Renewal School students are seeing bigger, better libraries. New writing programs. Educators are receiving extra professional development, especially around that new writing curricula and STEM teaching. We have a dynamite team, led by Aimee Horowitz, that is dedicated to implementing these changes and lifting up these schools.

And it's working. Attendance—a leading indicator for academic improvements—went up at 72 of the 94 Renewal Schools, and suspensions are dramatically down. The number of schools classified as Persistently Dangerous has been cut by more than half. Test scores overall are up in 2015 (0.6% in Math, 1.2% in English), And when graduation data comes in this fall, we expect to see that it's gone up.

Teachers are more confident in the direction of their schools—fully two-thirds say they wouldn't want to work in any other school, a jump from last year. And Renewal School parents are engaging with their child's school: almost 7 out of 10 families communicated with their child's teacher at least once a month, with more than half meeting in person at a parent-teacher conference on a monthly basis.

And—this is a big one—more than a quarter of Renewal School parents volunteered to support their child's school at least once a month last year. This is time out a life likely filled to the brim with work, childcare, or schooling of their own. It shows that parents are understanding the impact only they can have in a school community, and how that lifts up everyone—including their own child—higher than they ever thought.

For too long, we haven't even given students the chance to aim high in high school, because they haven't been offered the chance to do advanced work—a chance that we know, when taken, correlates with success. You can't shoot for the moon if there's no rocket to take you there.

That ends today. Today we offer every high schooler the chance to aim and achieve high. We are introducing AP for All: bringing Advanced Placement classes to every high school by 2022. This builds on the work of our AP Expansion program, which has brought new AP courses to over 70 high schools in NYC.

It's been shown that overall, students who take AP classes were twice as likely to graduate college in 5 year as compared to their peers who did not. Among minority and low-income populations, they were X times as likely. Simple exposure to the material can have a lasting impact; students who sat for an AP exam and only received a score of 1-2 (of 5) graduated college at a higher rate than their peers who did not take AP exams at all.

And now, back to that computer lab. Both computer equipment and Computer Science training is a novelty for many students and teachers, including those at nearly all of our Renewal Schools. Fewer than 5% of all NYC public school students have an opportunity to learn Computer Science, and those that do are clustered in just a few high-performing schools.

This is not sustainable for students or for our city, which increasingly needs more people with the computer proficiency to power all kinds of companies, from tech to finance to health to fashion. Hundreds of thousands of good jobs will be accessible to those with computer science skills, and beyond the reach of those without them.

That is why we are immensely proud to announce today the launch of Computer Science for All, which will provide a computer science education to every single public school student within ten years through an $81 million public-private partnership between the City of New York and CSNYC.

This is the largest effort to expand computer science in the country. It will make New York the largest school district in the nation to provide computer science to every student—and the first City to invest in the future of its students and its economy in this pioneering way.

The night ends, the sun rises behind the skyline, and it's 8 a.m. the next day. A high school senior grabs her buzzing phone off the kitchen table. It's lighting up with text messages from her mother, her Dedicated Counselor, the manager at the internship she just finished – and all the messages are variations on “Go get ‘em!”

She smiles and puts the phone in her purse, then turns to face her reflection in a mirror. She smooths her lapels, takes a deep breath, and catches the elevator right before the doors close. She's on the way out the door for a college interview.

That isn't, of course where the story ends. We hope, of course, that our student gets into that college. But we know if she doesn't, she's got the resilience and fortitude to go on another interview, and another after that. We've done right by her by instilling not just the knowledge she needs, but the tools, confidence and belief in herself to share that knowledge with the world, seize opportunities, and achieve success. That's how education in New York City has to work.

In other words: we must and will show each of our kids we believe in their ability to excel. . .

And give them the opportunity to show us we're right.

This show doesn't appear to be broadcast locally via a NYC station, so tough to determine local NYC listenership.

It is broadcast nationally via Sirius/XM and online and accessible that way to New Yorkers.

Hi Phil,

I caught the tail end of the mayor on Morning Joe before Christie came on and made ridiculous comments that went unchallenged. I'd like to re-extend an invitation for the mayor to appear on my radio show. There are only a few of us on the left who do national shows and we offer a platform that includes about 75 radio stations, Sirius/XM, our app, and online streaming. The power and effectiveness of talk radio is understood and harnessed by conservatives, but I've been trying for years to get more liberals to understand its value.

Can we please arrange an interview?

Best Wishes,

Alan

De Blasio's 'Progressive Agenda' to host film screening

By Laura Nahmias

1:17 p.m. | Sep. 8, 2015

The Progressive Agenda, the new organization formed by Mayor Bill de Blasio to push his platform on a national level, is hosting its first public event since the coalition's launch this spring — a screening of a documentary film by Robert Greenwaldon Thursday.

De Blasio will attend the screening, one of the event's organizer's confirmed.

In addition to showing Greenwald's new documentary, entitled “Hedge Fund Billionaires vs. Kindergarten Teachers: Whose Side Are You On?” the event will feature a question-and-answer session with both the filmmaker and the mayor.

Greenwald is the founder and president of Brave New Films. His films include "Wal-Mart: The High Cost of Low Price" and "Outfoxed: Rupert Murdoch's War on Journalism."

A copy of the invitation obtained by POLITICO New York describes the event as “a film screening on income inequality.”

The Progressive Agenda was formed in May, and is funded by the Campaign For One New York, the nonprofit 501(c)4 de Blasio created to push his top agenda items, including universal pre-kindergarten and the creation of affordable housing.

The Progressive Agenda has been hosting meetings with other elected officials, mayors and civil rights leaders since its official launch, one of its organizers said. De Blasio also held a conference call with former labor secretary Robert Reich in June, calling on Hillary Clinton to oppose the Trans-Pacific Partnership trade deal.

The event's website argues for closing the carried interest tax loophole, which is one of the planks of the Progressive Agenda's platform.

“Did you know that the top 25 hedge fund managers in the United States make more than every single kindergarten teacher in the country — combined?” an invitation to the event reads.

“There are a lot of reasons that the math shakes out so unfairly, but one of them is the carried-interest loophole, a tax law that essentially gives these one-percenters a much lower tax rate than they should be paying.”

The Progressive Agenda is planning to hold a presidential forum for 2016 presidential candidates in the fall, but has not released details about who has been invited, who is attending or when the event will take place.

Subject: September 10 Event Press Check In

Hello All

I will be the point person on press for Brave New Films.

The draft press release will be coming shortly for your review/edits. But I did have a few quick questions about press leading to and day of the event:

- We are more than happy to send out the press release and pitch to our contacts. However, we rarely have NY specific releases so that's not really our world. Are there any press lists/contacts you all have and would like to share to ensure full coverage of the event in NY media?
- For clarification, both offices will be sending out the press release, correct?
- Will there be an official photographer on site? If so will he/she be roaming or will they just be taking official pictures? Important for us to know.

Thanks everyone! Looking forward to a great event!

New York City Mayor Bill de Blasio Teams Up With Brave New Films to Take on Tax Breaks for the Wealthy in Premiere of New Short Film: Hedge Fund Billionaires vs. Kindergarten Teachers: Whose Side Are You On?

Mayor's office and production company create film demanding closure of the carried interest loophole which allows billionaires to be taxed at lower rates than kindergarten teachers.

Culver City, California (September 8, 2015) - Production company Brave New Films, headed by award winning filmmaker Robert Greenwald, has released a new short film demanding the closure of the carried interest tax loophole. The film, premiering at a private event at Pace University ~~headed led~~ by Mayor Bill de Blasio, addresses the [adj. like 'alarming' or 'ugly'] fact that while the top 25 hedge fund managers make more annually than all of America's kindergarten teachers combined, those same hedge fund managers are also taxed at a lower tax rate. Mayor de Blasio and Greenwald find the loophole appalling and are calling on all 2016 presidential candidates to pledge to end it within their first 100 days in office.

"It is unacceptable that the uber-wealthy have been able to influence the law to work in their favor," said director of the film and Brave New Films President Robert Greenwald. "While teachers around the nation are struggling to make ends meet, doing one of the most noble professions out there, billionaire hedge fund managers – who make money off of things like the housing crisis and for-profit prisons - are claiming they deserve massive tax breaks."

Quote from de Blasio's office.

"We have seen the crisis of inequality in this nation grow to critical mass, and now is time to act. It is downright reprehensible that U.S. pre-K teachers – the men and women who teach our kids the colors of the rainbow and the building blocks of language – are collectively earning the same wage as the top 25 hedge funder managers, and foot a heavier bill on tax day to boot. This film imparts an important message; that in America, our policies and tax codes should reflect our values, and reward hard work, not wealth," said Mayor Bill de Blasio.

The six-minute film will have its premiere screening on Thursday, September 10th, 2015 in the Schimmel Theatre at Pace University. On hand to give remarks will be both the Honorable Mayor Bill de Blasio, as well as filmmaker Robert Greenwald. The event begins at 4:30 pm EST.

Brave New Films is a non-partisan, non-profit, 501(c)(3) organization that carries out the Brave New Films mission by creating and distributing educational films. Its mission is to champion social justice issues by using a model of media, education, and grassroots volunteer involvement that inspires, empowers, motivates and teaches civic participation and makes a difference.

To confirm- we sent out invites to our list only. We would do that for another partner event. The obviously messy part is taxpayers.

I'm catching up here so I'm not sure what the initial parameters were with C41NY but we will pay our share to deal with this.

Hi Karen –

I'm with POLITICO now, but I'm returning to some of my New York politics roots (I was on the beat there 2005-2011, going back to the days when the mayor was running for city council speaker and public advocate) today and tomorrow because of Biden's trip in. Del Cecato and I were back and forth a little over email just now, and he suggested I drop you a line.

Two questions – first, do you know if the mayor is going to be part of the minimum wage event that Biden's doing?

Also: would the mayor have 5 minutes to talk today for a story I'm doing about how progressives in New York feel about Biden maybe jumping in, and about where Clinton is at this point? Obviously I would absolutely love to have him in this story if possible.

I'm at 703 341 4668 / cell [REDACTED] (still got my New York number) if you want to talk through at all.

Thanks.

This is what I've got for backgrounder for Thursday event. Probably too long.

I put that KVH isn't going to be there - will change that if she actually does come.

Event/Meeting Briefing Information

Staff Contact/Planning Lead: JDC

EVENT: Screening of short film, “Hedge Fund Billionaires vs. Kindergarten Teachers: Whose Side Are You On?”

MISSION/GOAL: Explain how NYC is doing everything in its power to combat income inequality, but that we need Washington’s help. Push two pieces of The Progressive Agenda – closing the carried interest loophole, and investing in education.

DAY/DATE: Thursday, September 10, 2015
EVENT TIME: 4:30-5:30 PM
MBDB TIME: 4:30-5:15PM

LOCATION: Pace University, Michael Schimmel Center for the Arts, 3 Spruce Street, Manhattan

CONTACT: JDC

STAFF ASSIGNED TO MBDB: Marti Adams

EVENT SET-UP/PROGRAM: YOU will be introduced by moderator Alex Wagner (MSNBC)

After she introduces YOU, you’ll speak for 5-7 minutes on the issue of progressive taxation and investing in education, TPA. Then YOU will introduce Robert Greenwald, who will introduce the film.

Then a panel of YOU, Greenwald, NYC Kindergarten teacher Lena Lombardi, and Lynn Parramore (who studies the intersection of culture and economics) will take pre-screened questions from the audience of 300 or so, with Wagner moderating.

RUN OF SHOW:

4:15pm Program participants arrive and are escorted to green room

4:30pm Welcome and Intro of Mayor: Alex Wagner (MSNBC)

4:33pm Intro of overall issue and of Robert Greenwald: Mayor de Blasio

4:40pm Intro Film: Robert Greenwald

4:43pm Film Screening

4:55pm Panel begins -- Alex Wagner as moderator begins with two questions for panelists

5:05pm Questions are collected from audience and sorted to avoid duplication and ensure resonance

5:25pm Program Ends

Topics:

- TPA, income inequality, carried interest loophole, tax fairness, education.

Background:

Shortly after TPA was launched on May 12th, we got a call from Robert Greenwald, progressive filmmaker and TPA signer.

He had an idea on how to use the power of film to highlight the great disparity between the incomes of hedge fund managers and Kindergarten teachers – and highlight the inequity in the fact that the former pays a lower tax rate than the latter.

The film is being debuted on Thursday in NYC, and will also be live-streamed on HuffingtonPost.com.

We will be using new media tools – Facebook, Twitter,

Instagram, Periscope – to urge that the video be shared online to a massive audience.

A couple of years ago, very few aspiring elected officials were talking about income inequality. Throughout 2015, we've seen more and more elected officials and candidates from BOTH political parties discussing the problem.

Recently, we've heard a number of excellent proposals for combatting inequality – including, just in the past several days – Donald Trump and Jeb Bush calling for an end to the carried interest loophole.

We're using every tool at our disposal to combat inequality in NYC (UPK – just this week). But we need Washington to be our partner if we want to tackle this problem at its core.

It's time for Americans from all walks of life to come together and pressure Washington to make this change so that we can make the tax code more fair, and invest more in our schools.

We don't do this to punish success. Rather, we do it to create more success stories.

FYI: Katrina vanden Heuvel is a board member of Brave New Films. She will not be in attendance.

BACKGROUND ON Robert Greenwald:

Robert Greenwald, founder and president of Brave New Films (BNF), is an award-winning television, feature film and documentary filmmaker. He has produced and/or directed more than 50 TV movies and miniseries, including The Burning Bed (1984), starring Farrah Fawcett and A Woman of Independent Means (1995), starring Sally Field; as well as the feature films Steal This Movie (2000), starring Vincent D'Onofrio as 60's radical Abbie Hoffman, and Breaking Up (1997), starring Russell Crowe and Salma Hayek.

Greenwald turned to documentary filmmaking in 2002, inspired by pervasive voter rights abuses in the 2000 U.S. presidential election. He found audiences eager for substantive investigations of social issues, told through personal stories, and chose to bypass the usual gatekeepers by devising creative means of distribution, first through house parties, and ultimately through the Internet and social media. The documentaries produced by Brave New Films have been streamed across all seven continents and have been viewed over 70 million times and counting.

At BNF, Greenwald has produced and directed eight full-length documentaries and over a dozen short videos, uncovering corporate abuse, the military industrial complex, the unbridled political influence of billionaires, and the unfair and unbalanced tactics of Fox News. His full-length features include; Uncovered: The War on Iraq (2004); Outfoxed: Rupert Murdoch's War on Journalism (2004); Wal-Mart: The High Cost of Low Price (2005); Iraq for Sale: The War Profiteers (2006); Rethink Afghanistan (2009); Koch Brothers Exposed (2012); and War on Whistleblowers: Free Press and the National Security State (2013). Unmanned: America's Drone Wars (2013) is BNF's latest feature-length documentary.

Greenwald is the recipient of many awards and accolades, including a Maggie Award from the Planned Parenthood Federation, the Peacemaker Award from the Physicians for Social Responsibility, the City of Justice award from LAANE, the 2007 Norman Felton and Denise Aubuchon Humanitarian Award, and Liberty Hill Foundation's Upton Sinclair Award. Greenwald was honored in 2013 by the ACLU Foundation of Southern California for his activism and also received the 2001 Peabody Award and the 2002 American Film Institute

Producer of the Year award. His films have garnered 25 Emmy nominations.

BACKGROUND ON Lynn Parramore:

Lynn Parramore is an author and cultural theorist. She is Contributing Editor at AlterNet and writes for Reuters, Al Jazeera, and other outlets. She holds a doctorate in English and cultural theory from New York University.

BACKGROUN ON Alex Wagner:

Alexandra "Alex" Wagner is an American television host and political commentator. She was the anchor of the daytime program Now with Alex Wagner on MSNBC.

Wagner has worked as the cultural correspondent for the Center for American Progress. From 2003 to 2007, she was editor-in-chief of The Fader magazine, covering music and cultural movements from around the world. She also served as executive director of Not On Our Watch Project, an advocacy organization focused on mass atrocities and human rights violations.

Wagner then became the White House correspondent for Politics Daily, a political news magazine under AOL News. She moved to The Huffington Post after it was acquired by AOL.

As an analyst on MSNBC, Wagner appeared on Countdown with Keith Olbermann and The Last Word with Lawrence O'Donnell.

NOTE: Alex's show on MSNBC was canceled in July – but she still appears as a commentator.

MAIN POINTS TO LAND:

- Income inequality is the crisis of our time. Here in NYC, we're doing everything in our power to combat it – UPK, after-school, paid sick leave, building affordable housing, fighting for a higher minimum wage, demanding more from developers.
- But to really get at the root of the problem, we need Washington's help.
- The Progressive Agenda comes down to a very simple concept – we need to reward work again. We need to reward work, not wealth – work.
 - As a society, as a nation, as a government, we reward wealth more and more every day, which is just concentrating wealth into fewer and fewer hands. It's not just smart, clever people in the financial industry. It's a set of government policies that continually allow them to concentrate the wealth.
- There's no two ways about it: we have an economic crisis in this country. The issue of income inequality is a profound threat to this country and its future – that we are experiencing growing divisions that must be addressed.
- The Progressive Agenda is a movement from the grassroots. It's an urgent call for change. We're hearing the voices of people every day – people all over this country. Recently, we saw demonstrations in 200 cities (60,000 people) across this country for a $15 dollar minimum wage.
 - Something is changing in America. It's time to take that energy and crystalize it into an agenda that will make a difference. It's time to put people ahead of profits – value work over wealth. It's as simple as that.
- We'll be calling on leaders and candidates to address these issues, to stiffen their backbones, to be clear, and to champion these progressive policies.

Transitions

- There's no reason that a billionaire hedge fund manager sitting by the pool at his beach house should be paying a lower rate of taxes than the guy who pilots his private jet.

Key Stats/ Examples

- If you're going to reduce the income gap, you need two things: 1) more investment in programs and policies that lift the floor for working people (paid sick leave, $15 min wage, child care) and 2) more revenue from those at the very top – millionaires, billionaires, and wealthy corporations (close carried interest loophole, close CEO pay loophole, Buffett Rule, end tax breaks for companies that ship jobs overseas).
- President Obama pointed out that the top 25 hedge fund titans in America earn more than every kindergarten teacher in America. Think about that. $12 billion for 25 people – more than all the money earned by the women and men teaching our four and five year olds - COMBINED.
- In NYC, 46 percent of the people are at or near the poverty level. That is based on a statistic from the Bloomberg Administration. It came out first in 2013. It's essentially the same today, 46 percent of people at or near the poverty level, one paycheck away.
- Minimum Wage - In 2014, four states passed minimum wage increases by referenda. They were all red states. Something bigger is going on here that I think indicates people are more and more demanding some solutions. The grassroots is demanding it.
- A typical American family, in real income terms, is making less today than they were a quarter century ago.
- The wealthiest one percent captured 91% of all the income gains since the Great Recession ended.
- And now we have the greatest income disparity since the 1920s – and it's getting worse.
- The two issues that we're highlighting today are closing the carried interest loophole, and investing more in education. We don't advocate that to punish success, but to create more success stories.

The Progressive Agenda:

- Raise the federal minimum wage, so that it reaches $15/hour, while indexing it to inflation.
- Reform the National Labor Relations Act, to enhance workers' right to organize and rebuild the middle class.

- Pass comprehensive immigration reform to grow the economy and protect against exploitation of low-wage workers.
- Oppose trade deals that hand more power to corporations at the expense of American jobs, workers' rights, and the environment.
- Invest in schools, not jails-- and give a second chance to those coming home from prison.
- Pass national paid sick leave.
- Pass national paid family leave.
- Make Pre-K, after-school programs and childcare universal.
- Expand the Earned Income Tax Credit and protect and expand Social Security.
- Allow students to refinance student loan debt to take advantage of lower interest rates, and support debt-free college.
- Close the carried interest loophole.
- End tax breaks for companies that ship jobs overseas.
- Implement the "Buffett Rule" so millionaires pay their fair share.

Close the CEO tax loophole that allows corporations to take advantage of "performance pay" write-offs.

4:40pm Intro Film: Robert Greenwald

4:43pm Film Screening

4:55pm Panel begins -- Alex Wagner as moderator begins with two questions for panelists

5:05pm Questions are collected from audience and sorted to avoid duplication and ensure resonance

5:25pm Program Ends

Topics:

- TPA, income inequality, carried interest loophole, tax fairness, education.

Background:

Shortly after TPA was launched on May 12th, we got a call from Robert Greenwald, progressive filmmaker and TPA signer.

He had an idea on how to use the power of film to highlight the great disparity between the incomes of hedge fund managers and Kindergarten teachers – and highlight the inequity in the fact that the former pays a lower tax rate than the latter.

The film is being debuted on Thursday in NYC, and will also be live-streamed on HuffingtonPost.com.

We will be using new media tools – Facebook, Twitter,

Instagram, Periscope – to urge that the video be shared online to a massive audience.

A couple of years ago, very few aspiring elected officials were talking about income inequality. Throughout 2015, we've seen more and more elected officials and candidates from BOTH political parties discussing the problem.

Recently, we've heard a number of excellent proposals for combatting inequality – including, just in the past several days – Donald Trump and Jeb Bush calling for an end to the carried interest loophole.

We're using every tool at our disposal to combat inequality in NYC (UPK – just this week). But we need Washington to be our partner if we want to tackle this problem at its core.

It's time for Americans from all walks of life to come together and pressure Washington to make this change so that we can make the tax code more fair, and invest more in our schools.

We don't do this to punish success. Rather, we do it to create more success stories.

FYI: Katrina vanden Heuvel is a board member of Brave New Films. She will not be in attendance.

BACKGROUND ON Robert Greenwald:

Robert Greenwald, founder and president of Brave New Films (BNF), is an award-winning television, feature film and documentary filmmaker. He has produced and/or directed more than 50 TV movies and miniseries, including The Burning Bed (1984), starring Farrah Fawcett and A Woman of Independent Means (1995), starring Sally Field; as well as the feature films Steal This Movie (2000), starring Vincent D'Onofrio as 60's radical Abbie Hoffman, and Breaking Up (1997), starring Russell Crowe and Salma Hayek.

Greenwald turned to documentary filmmaking in 2002, inspired by pervasive voter rights abuses in the 2000 U.S. presidential election. He found audiences eager for substantive investigations of social issues, told through personal stories, and chose to bypass the usual gatekeepers by devising creative means of distribution, first through house parties, and ultimately through the Internet and social media. The documentaries produced by Brave New Films have been streamed across all seven continents and have been viewed over 70 million times and counting.

At BNF, Greenwald has produced and directed eight full-length documentaries and over a dozen short videos, uncovering corporate abuse, the military industrial complex, the unbridled political influence of billionaires, and the unfair and unbalanced tactics of Fox News. His full-length features include; Uncovered: The War on Iraq (2004); Outfoxed: Rupert Murdoch's War on Journalism (2004); Wal-Mart: The High Cost of Low Price (2005); Iraq for Sale: The War Profiteers (2006); Rethink Afghanistan (2009); Koch Brothers Exposed (2012); and War on Whistleblowers: Free Press and the National Security State (2013). Unmanned: America's Drone Wars (2013) is BNF's latest feature-length documentary.

Greenwald is the recipient of many awards and accolades, including a Maggie Award from the Planned Parenthood Federation, the Peacemaker Award from the Physicians for Social Responsibility, the City of Justice award from LAANE, the 2007 Norman Felton and Denise Aubuchon Humanitarian Award, and Liberty Hill Foundation's Upton Sinclair Award. Greenwald was honored in 2013 by the ACLU Foundation of Southern California for his activism and also received the 2001 Peabody Award and the 2002 American Film Institute

Producer of the Year award. His films have garnered 25 Emmy nominations.

BACKGROUND ON Lynn Parramore:

Lynn Parramore is an author and cultural theorist. She is Contributing Editor at AlterNet and writes for Reuters, Al Jazeera, and other outlets. She holds a doctorate in English and cultural theory from New York University.

BACKGROUND ON Alex Wagner:

Alexandra "Alex" Wagner is an American television host and political commentator. She was the anchor of the daytime program Now with Alex Wagner on MSNBC.

Wagner has worked as the cultural correspondent for the Center for American Progress. From 2003 to 2007, she was editor-in-chief of The Fader magazine, covering music and cultural movements from around the world. She also served as executive director of Not On Our Watch Project, an advocacy organization focused on mass atrocities and human rights violations.

Wagner then became the White House correspondent for Politics Daily, a political news magazine under AOL News. She moved to The Huffington Post after it was acquired by AOL.

As an analyst on MSNBC, Wagner appeared on Countdown with Keith Olbermann and The Last Word with Lawrence O'Donnell.

NOTE: Alex's show on MSNBC was canceled in July – but she still appears as a commentator.

BACKGROUND ON Lena Lombardi:

Lena Lombardi has been a Gifted Education teacher at P.S. 132 for six years, and has taught Gifted and Talented Kindergarten for five of those years. She graduated from Hofstra University's Honors College with a Bachelor of Arts degree in Public Relations and worked briefly as a publicist out of college before deciding to follow her heart and pursue her lifelong dream of becoming a teacher. She completed her certification through a career-change program at St. John's University, and she currently holds a Master of Science degree from SJU in both Childhood Education (Grades 1-6) and Gifted Education (Grades K-12.) She was born and raised in Williamsburg, Brooklyn and attended the elementary school at which she currently teaches. She and her husband (John) currently live in Middle Village, Queens.

Two separate spaces for Press and Electeds needs to be blocked, we will need someone from Marti's team and from CAU to manage these sections.
Panelists will not be sitting in the audience, they will remain offstage and then enter for panel at the end of the film.
No podium, just flags on stage left, where Alex, the Mayor and Robert will intro the screening.
Yes, we have chairs. They will be set off stage right and brought on after the screening.
MOSPCE will provide and collect index cards.
I am receiving Alex's first two questions today and will send to this list.
Our digital ambassadors could not make it to this event. Can I suggest that the background slide include appropriate #'s and handles if possible?
Yes, MOSPCE taking care of moderator and economist, and we should also make sure that K teacher knows she will not be watching the film and will need to view the link beforehand.
Hayley, do you want to remain point for K teacher?

Hi all,

Free to do a call today to go over last minute details, and think we should also add Mayor's advance team?

Need to talk through press/electeds

- blocking off area for reporters
- will be on Mayor's schedule, and City Hall/TPA/Greenwald will all send out releases?
- do we need to reserve a space for electeds/do we know who if any are attending?

Stage setup/logistics

- MOSPCE ordered chairs
- using Mayor's podium, or podium pace provided?
- City Hall Seal on Podium or TPA sign?
- Slide in the background currently co-branded Brave New Films and TPA. Do we need to change that?
- passing out and collecting question cards. MOSPCE is your team handling this?

Participants

- I talked to K teacher yesterday
- MOSPCE you have given full detail to the economist and moderator?

Briefing

- JDC you are putting together background and talking points for Mayor
- I can put together bios on participants for briefing unless someone else has already done that?

I'm sure there are many other things. But we should nail all of this down asap. Let me know what works for everyone. I can do any time besides 2pm.

Will do

The rampant inequality that we face in America is no accident. It is the result of a system that, for too long, has rewarded existing wealth over work.

There is no more striking example of this phenomenon than the disparity between the earnings - and the tax rates - of kindergarten teachers and hedge fund managers.

In 2014, the top 25 hedge fund managers made more money than every single Kindergarten teacher in America -- over 150,000 of them -- combined. That's right: 25 individuals - not even enough to fill the seating space on a single New York City subway car - made more than everyone who teaches our youngest learners put together.

What's more, because of something called carried interest - a tax loophole that exists only to boost the earnings of hedge fund managers - those 25 people paid a lower tax rate than the average Kindergarten teacher.

If we're to truly tackle the crisis of income inequality, changing that rule - and investing that money in growing our middle class - is where we must start.

Here in New York City, we're using every tool at our disposal to help combat income inequality - expanding paid sick leave to 500,000 additional workers, implementing the first rent freeze in city history, building and preserving 200,000 units of affordable housing, expanding after-school programs, and - as of this week - providing high-quality, universal Pre-Kindergarten to every family.

But we need Washington to do its part, too. Making the federal tax code more progressive will allow us to invest in people who are struggling.

To that end, closing the carried interest loophole is a tenet of The Progressive Agenda (URL HERE) to Combat Income Inequality, a 14-point plan introduced by a diverse coalition of progressive leaders in May.

Award-winning filmmaker Robert Greenwald, an inaugural signer of The Progressive Agenda, worked with his colleagues at Brave New Films to produce a powerful short documentary about the deeply unfair income and tax law disparities between hedge fund managers and teachers. It is aptly titled "Hedge Fund Billionaires vs. Kindergarten Teachers: Whose Side Are You On?"

The film explores this issue from many different angles. It features interviews with both respected economists and Kindergarten teachers. The video identifies both the macroeconomic problems that the huge gap in wages cause, as well as the human toll paid by teachers and their students. Most important, it proposes a real, concrete solution to the problem: closing the carried interest loophole.

Billionaire hedge fund managers don't need a tax break, and there is no reason this loophole should exist.

Robert and I will be hosting a screening of his film at Pace University in New York City on Thursday, September 10th at 4:30 PM. The video will also be live-streamed here on The Huffington Post \(STREAMING INFO HERE\).

Following the screening, Robert and I will join a panel that includes NYC Kindergarten teacher Lena Lombardi, and author Lynn Parramore and moderated by MSNBC's Alex Wagner, to reflect on the film, what it means for New York City and the country, and how we can work together to end this injustice once and for all. Here are the questions from Lynn Parramore:

1. People argue a lot about what drives inequality of economic inequality. Liberals point to skyrocketing CEO pay, the weakening of unions, and low wages. Conservatives often blame technological change and lack of job skills. Why is this particular driver, the carried interest loophole, considered so unfair and unjustified by people across the political spectrum?

2. How does the continuation of policies like the carried interest loophole change us as a society? What do we stand to lose if we don't end it?

Two separate spaces for Press and Electeds needs to be blocked, we will need someone from Marti's team and from CAU to manage these sections.

Panelists will not be sitting in the audience, they will remain offstage and then enter for panel at the end of the film.

No podium, just flags on stage left, where Alex, the Mayor and Robert will intro the screening.

Yes, we have chairs. They will be set off stage right and brought on after the screening.

MOSPCE will provide and collect index cards.

I am receiving Alex's first two questions today and will send to this list.

Our digital ambassadors could not make it to this event.

Can I suggest that the background slide include appropriate #'s and handles if possible?

Yes, MOSPCE taking care of moderator and economist, and we should also make sure that K teacher knows she will not be watching the film and will need to view the link beforehand. Hayley, do you want to remain point for K teacher?

Hi all,

Free to do a call today to go over last minute details, and think we should also add Mayor's advance team?

Need to talk through press/electeds

-- blocking off area for reporters

-- will be on Mayor's schedule, and City

Hall/TPA/Greenwald will all send out releases?

-- do we need to reserve a space for electeds/do we know who if any are attending?

Stage setup/logistics

-- MOSPCE ordered chairs

-- using Mayor's podium, or podium pace provided?

-- City Hall Seal on Podium or TPA sign?

-- Slide in the background currently co-branded Brave

New Films and TPA. Do we need to change that?
-- passing out and collecting question cards. MOSPCE is your team handling this?

Participants

-- I talked to K teacher yesterday
-- MOSPCE you have given full detail to the economist and moderator?

Briefing

-- JDC you are putting together background and talking points for Mayor
-- I can put together bios on participants for briefing
unless someone else has already done that?

I'm sure there are many other things. But we should nail all of this down asap. Let me know what works for everyone. I can do any time besides 2pm.

The rampant inequality that we face in America is no accident. It is the result of a system that, for too long, has rewarded existing wealth over work.

There is no more striking example of this phenomenon than the disparity between the earnings - and the tax rates - of kindergarten teachers and hedge fund managers.

In 2014, the top 25 hedge fund managers made more money than every single Kindergarten teacher in America -- over 150,000 of them -- combined. That's right: 25 individuals - not even enough to fill the seating space on a single New York City subway car - made more than everyone who teaches our youngest learners put together.

What's more, because of something called carried interest - a tax loophole that exists only to boost the earnings of hedge fund managers - those 25 people paid a lower tax rate than the average Kindergarten teacher.

If we're to truly tackle the crisis of income inequality, changing that rule - and investing that money in growing our middle class - is where we must start.

Here in New York City, we're using every tool at our disposal to help combat income inequality - expanding paid sick leave to 500,000 additional workers, implementing the first rent freeze in city history, building and preserving 200,000 units of affordable housing, expanding after-school programs, and - as of this week - providing high-quality, universal Pre-Kindergarten to every family.

But we need Washington to do its part, too. Making the federal tax code more progressive will allow us to invest in people who are struggling.

To that end, closing the carried interest loophole is a tenet of The Progressive Agenda (URL HERE) to Combat Income Inequality, a 14-point plan introduced by a diverse coalition of progressive leaders in May.

Award-winning filmmaker Robert Greenwald, an inaugural signer of The Progressive Agenda, worked with his colleagues at Brave New Films to produce a powerful short documentary about the deeply unfair income and tax law disparities between hedge fund managers and teachers. It is aptly titled "Hedge Fund Billionaires vs. Kindergarten Teachers: Whose Side Are You On?"

The film explores this issue from many different angles. It features interviews with both respected economists and Kindergarten teachers. The video identifies both the macroeconomic problems that the huge gap in wages cause, as well as the human toll paid by teachers and their students. Most important, it proposes a real, concrete solution to the problem: closing the carried interest loophole.

Billionaire hedge fund managers don't need a tax break, and there is no reason this loophole should exist.

Robert and I will be hosting a screening of his film at Pace University in New York City on Thursday, September 10th at 4:30 PM. The video will also be live-streamed here on The Huffington Post \(STREAMING INFO HERE\).

Following the screening, Robert and I will join a panel that includes NYC Kindergarten teacher Lena Lombardi, and author Lynn Parramore and moderated by MSNBC's Alex Wagner, to reflect on the film, what it means for New York City and the country, and how we can work together to end this injustice once and for all.

Two separate spaces for Press and Electeds needs to be blocked, we will need someone from Marti's team and from CAU to manage these sections.

Panelists will not be sitting in the audience, they will remain offstage and then enter for panel at the end of the film.

No podium, just flags on stage left, where Alex, the Mayor and Robert will intro the screening.

Yes, we have chairs. They will be set off stage right and brought on after the screening.

MOSPCE will provide and collect index cards.

I am receiving Alex's first two questions today and will send to this list.

Our digital ambassadors could not make it to this event.

Can I suggest that the background slide include appropriate #'s and handles if possible?

Yes, MOSPCE taking care of moderator and economist, and we should also make sure that K teacher knows she will not be watching the film and will need to view the link beforehand. Hayley, do you want to remain point for K teacher?

Hi all,

Free to do a call today to go over last minute details, and think we should also add Mayor's advance team?

Need to talk through press/electeds

- blocking off area for reporters
- will be on Mayor's schedule, and City
Hall/TPA/Greenwald will all send out releases?
- do we need to reserve a space for electeds/do we know who if any are attending?

Stage setup/logistics

- MOSPCE ordered chairs
- using Mayor's podium, or podium pace provided?
- City Hall Seal on Podium or TPA sign?
- Slide in the background currently co-branded Brave
New Films and TPA. Do we need to change that?
- passing out and collecting question cards. MOSPCE is your team handling this?

Participants

- I talked to K teacher yesterday
- MOSPCE you have given full detail to the economist
and moderator?

Briefing

- JDC you are putting together background and talking points for Mayor
- I can put together bios on participants for briefing
unless someone else has already done that?

I'm sure there are many other things. But we should nail all of this down asap. Let me know what works for everyone. I can do any time besides 2pm.

Subject: Film Screening Tick-Tock

Hi All,

Here is the tick-tock I've provided to Alex Wagner:

4:15pm Program participants arrive and are escorted to green room
4:30pm Welcome and Intro of Mayor: Alex Wagner
4:33pm Intro of overall issue and of Robert Greenwald: Mayor de Blasio
4:40pm Intro Film: Robert Greenwald
4:43pm Film Screening
4:55pm Panel begins -- Alex Wagner as moderator begins with two questions for panelists
5:05pm Questions are collected from audience and sorted to avoid duplication and ensure resonance
5:25pm Program Ends

Alex Wagner is going to send her two questions by tomorrow, which I'll share with this group. Do we have a confirmed press list yet?

I have a request out to Lynn Parramore to be our economist on the panel and am waiting to hear back. We have five tall director chairs being delivered tomorrow.

More soon,
Carla

The rampant inequality that we face in America is no accident. It is the result of a system that, for too long, has rewarded existing wealth over work.

There is no more striking example of this phenomenon than the disparity between the earnings - and the tax rates - of kindergarten teachers and hedge fund managers.

In 2014, the top 25 hedge fund managers made more money than every single Kindergarten teacher in America -- over 150,000 of them -- combined. That's right: 25 individuals - not even enough to fill the seating space on a single New York City subway car - made more than everyone who teaches our youngest learners put together.

What's more, because of something called carried interest - a tax loophole that exists only to boost the earnings of hedge fund managers - those 25 people paid a lower tax rate than the average Kindergarten teacher.

If we're to truly tackle the crisis of income inequality, changing that rule - and investing that money in growing our middle class - is where we must start.

Here in New York City, we're using every tool at our disposal to help combat income inequality - expanding paid sick leave to 500,000 additional workers, implementing the first rent freeze in city history, building and preserving 200,000 units of affordable housing, expanding after-school programs, and - as of this week - providing high-quality, universal Pre-Kindergarten to every family.

But we need Washington to do its part, too. Making the federal tax code more progressive will allow us to invest in people who are struggling.

To that end, closing the carried interest loophole is a tenet of The Progressive Agenda (URL HERE) to Combat Income Inequality, a 14-point plan introduced by a diverse coalition of progressive leaders in May.

Award-winning filmmaker Robert Greenwald, an inaugural signer of The Progressive Agenda, worked with his colleagues at Brave New Films to produce a powerful short documentary about the deeply unfair income and tax law disparities between hedge fund managers and teachers. It is aptly titled "Hedge Fund Billionaires vs. Kindergarten Teachers: Whose Side Are You On?"

The film explores this issue from many different angles. It features interviews with both respected economists and Kindergarten teachers. The video identifies both the macroeconomic problems that the huge gap in wages cause, as well as the human toll paid by teachers and their students. Most important, it proposes a real, concrete solution to the problem: closing the carried interest loophole.

Billionaire hedge fund managers don't need a tax break, and there is no reason this loophole should exist.

Robert and I will be hosting a screening of his film at Pace University in New York City on Thursday, September 10th at 4:30 PM. The video will also be live-streamed here on The Huffington Post \(STREAMING INFO HERE\).

Following the screening, Robert and I will join a panel that includes NYC Kindergarten teacher Lena Lombardi, and author Lynn Parramore to reflect on the film, what it means for New York City and the country, and how we can work together to end this injustice once and for all.

N.Y. Gov. Andrew Cuomo to Make Push for $15 Hourly Minimum Wage Statewide

WSJ – Josh Dawsey, Erica Orden

<http://www.wsj.com/articles/n-y-gov-andrew-cuomo-to-make-push-for-15-hourly-minimum-wage-statewide-1441830531>

Gov. Andrew Cuomo, after moving to boost the minimum wage for fast-food workers in New York state earlier this year, is expected on Thursday to propose a $15-per-hour statewide minimum wage for all industries, according to people familiar with the matter.

In announcing his effort, Mr. Cuomo, a Democrat, will receive an important backer: Vice President Joe Biden, who is set to appear with Mr. Cuomo at the news conference.

A spokeswoman for Mr. Cuomo didn't immediately respond to a request for comment.

People familiar with the talks on Wednesday said discussions on the proposal remained fluid and that the final number could change. New York's current minimum hourly wage across all industries is $8.75 and is set to increase to $9 at the end of the year.

Mr. Cuomo's push is likely to face opposition in New York's state Legislature. There, the Republican-led Senate has resisted previous efforts by Mr. Cuomo and others to raise the minimum wage, and the governor's recent initiative to boost wages for fast-food workers has drawn criticism.

The raise for fast-food workers, in fact, wasn't done through legislative channels but instead through a wage board created by an executive order from Mr. Cuomo. That raise was proposed by the wage board and endorsed by Mr. Cuomo, and it is expected to be approved by the labor commissioner despite backlash from businesses that have said higher costs will lead to job losses.

A statewide raise for all workers would hand Mr. Cuomo, now in his second term, significant political gains with labor unions and liberal Democrats, who cheered his efforts in the fast-food industry and have encouraged him to pursue broader boosts to minimum-wage laws.

Fromo in my shop is sending Lena her talking points (and he's talking to her)...

Can you get talking points & suggested questions to Lynn?

Lena Fontana Talking Points

- No one I know ever became a teacher for the money.
- You know when you become a teacher that it's not going to make you wealthy, but that's OK because the job is so rewarding in so many other ways.
- As a teacher, you can help make the difference between kids succeeding or falling behind.
- We all work so hard to do right by our students because we know that what we do matters. But what also matters is how much funding our schools get.
- When our schools are underfunded, we feel it, and so do our students.
- Sometimes it even means teachers having to go into their own pockets to pay for basic supplies.
- When millionaires and billionaires get tax breaks, it means they aren't paying their fair share to help our schools and our kids.
- When I learned that billionaire hedge fund managers probably pay a lower tax rate than teachers do, I was shocked. Not only is it unfair to teachers like me, it's so unfair to my students.
- I think it's great that people are successful, but I want the kids I teach to have the opportunity to be successful too. That means making sure they have the resources they need to learn and grow.
- It really is a choice: the money hedge fund managers get in tax breaks has to come from somewhere.
- If you're for better schools, you should also be for closing the carried interest loophole.

Lynn Parramore Talking Points

- We've heard in the film and from others up here how unfair the carried interest loophole is, and I couldn't agree with that more.
- I can say it's not just unjust; it's also bad for our economy.
- Economies work best when they reward hard work and entrepreneurial risk taking.
- The carried interest loophole does neither - it's nothing more than a giveaway to billionaire hedge fund managers for doing their jobs investing other people's money.
- The carried interest loophole does nothing to help the economy. In fact, it keeps money highly concentrated at the very top of the economic ladder, something that is inherently bad for the economy.
- For decades, conservatives have argued that if we just give more tax breaks to those at the top, the money will magically trickle down and everyone will do better.
- The problem with that thinking? We've seen their plan in action - it doesn't work.
- In fact, the staggering inequality we face in America today is the direct result of policies that gave tax breaks to the people who need them least.
- The carried interest loophole is a stark example of this.
- Hedge fund managers do not need a tax cut. They are multimillionaires and billionaires. They can afford to pay a little more in taxes to do things like funding early childhood education.
- Inequality is a huge problem, and taking this step alone won't fix

it. But it's such an obvious and important step in the right direction that it's hard to believe this is even up for debate.

- Ending the carried interest loophole is the right thing to do for working people, and for our economy.

SAMPLE Questions from Moderator Lynn Parramore

People argue a lot about what drives inequality of economic inequality. Liberals point to skyrocketing CEO pay, the weakening of unions, and low wages. Conservatives often blame technological change and lack of job skills. Why is this particular driver, the carried interest loophole, considered so unfair and unjustified by people across the political spectrum?

How does the continuation of policies like the carried interest loophole change us as a society? What do we stand to lose if we don't end it?

Why is the carried interest loophole something people should care about? If the carried interest loophole were closed, what kind of difference would it make for ordinary Americans?

Let's take a step back and talk about income inequality in America: how did we get to the huge disparities in income and opportunity that we face today? How is the carried interest loophole a part of that story?

Some people say efforts like this are just class warfare - that progressives just want to punish those who have been successful and score political points by doing so. How do you respond to that?

Donald Trump recently said that hedge fund managers are "getting away with murder" when it comes to the tax code. Jeb Bush just in the last few days proposed getting rid of the carried interest loophole. It seems like this should be a no brainer. Why is it so hard to get Republicans in Congress on board with this?

Supporters of the carried interest loophole say that ending it would discourage investment and hurt the economy - how do you respond to that?

What can people sitting at home right now actually do to help make ending the carried interest loophole a reality?

How can progressives join forces to push for changes like closing the carried interest loophole? What is The Progressive Agenda and how can people be a part of the work you are doing?

Why is early childhood education such an important part of this conversation? Can you talk about efforts to address that issue locally?

Subject: Full rundown of docs for Thursday

The rampant inequality that we face in America is no accident. It is the result of a system that, for too long, has rewarded existing wealth over work.

There is no more striking example of this phenomenon than the disparity between the earnings - and the tax rates - of kindergarten teachers and hedge fund managers.

In 2014, the top 25 hedge fund managers made more money than every single Kindergarten teacher in America -- over 150,000 of them -- combined. That's right: 25 individuals - not even enough to fill the seating space on a single New York City subway car - made more than everyone who teaches our youngest learners put together.

What's more, because of something called carried interest - a tax loophole that exists only to boost the earnings of hedge fund managers - those 25 people paid a lower tax rate than the average Kindergarten teacher.

If we're to truly tackle the crisis of income inequality, changing that rule - and investing that money in growing our middle class - is where we must start.

Here in New York City, we're using every tool at our disposal to help combat income inequality - expanding paid sick leave to 500,000 additional workers, implementing the first rent freeze in city history, building and preserving 200,000 units of affordable housing, expanding after-school programs, and - as of this week - providing high-quality, universal Pre-Kindergarten to every family.

But we need Washington to do its part, too. Making the federal tax code more progressive will allow us to invest in people who are struggling.

To that end, closing the carried interest loophole is a tenet of The Progressive Agenda (URL HERE) to Combat Income Inequality, a 14-point plan introduced by a diverse coalition of progressive leaders in May.

Award-winning filmmaker Robert Greenwald, an inaugural signer of The Progressive Agenda, worked with his colleagues at Brave New Films to produce a powerful short documentary about the deeply unfair income and tax law disparities between hedge fund managers and teachers. It is aptly titled "Hedge Fund Billionaires vs. Kindergarten Teachers: Whose Side Are You On?"

The film explores this issue from many different angles. It features interviews with both respected economists and Kindergarten teachers. The video identifies both the macroeconomic problems that the huge gap in wages cause, as well as the human toll paid by teachers and their students. Most important, it proposes a real, concrete solution to the problem: closing the carried interest loophole.

Billionaire hedge fund managers don't need a tax break, and there is no reason this loophole should exist.

Robert and I will be hosting a screening of his film at Pace University in New York City on Thursday, September 10th at 4:30 PM. The video will also be live-streamed here on The Huffington Post \(STREAMING INFO HERE\).

Following the screening, Robert and I will join a panel that includes NYC Kindergarten teacher Lena Lombardi, and author Lynn Parramore to reflect on the film, what it means for New York City and the country, and how we can work together to end this injustice once and for all.

MBDB REMARKS

Film Screening

Thursday, September 10th

- Thank you Lynn for that warm introduction. And thank you so much for agreeing to moderate this special event.
- I also want to thank Pace University for hosting today's screening. Thank you to all the folks at Brave New Films for their hard work in creating the main attraction here today.
- ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS OF VIPs in audience?
- I also want to give a special shout-out to Brave New Films board member Katrina vanden Heuvel, who's been such a powerful voice for combatting income inequality in New York and across our country.
- And thank you to my distinguished fellow panel members – Robert Greenwald, NYC Kindergarten teacher, as well as author Lena Lombardi – who's graciously agreed to do double-duty for us today.
- We're all gathered here today to shine a bright light on what I believe is the central issue of our time: income inequality.
- When I became Mayor, I pledged to take dead aim at the Tale of Two Cities that we were living in New York City – a place that is home to so many millionaires and billionaires, while nearly half our city lives at or near the poverty level.
- Our administration is doing everything in its power to tackle this massive challenge. After-school, first rent freeze in history, paid sick leave for 500K, living wage expansion, 200K units of affordable housing, fighting for a higher minimum wage.
- And perhaps most significantly, just this week, we made good on a central promise – to provide high-quality, full-day Pre-K to every single family in New York City. That alone will truly transform so many young lives.

- But New York City doesn't operate in a vacuum. We need help from Washington to really tackle the crisis of inequality.
- Back in May, I joined with dozens of fellow progressives – elected officials at every level, civil rights champions, labor leaders, cultural luminaries, economists, and grassroots activists – to unveil The Progressive Agenda to Combat Income Inequality.
- The Progressive Agenda consists of more than a dozen policy proposals that can be enacted at the federal level to put a meaningful dent in the inequality we face. Many of the items are directed at lifting people out of poverty and into the middle class. Others are focused on helping working and middle-class people achieve a little more security in their own lives, so they aren't struggling quite so hard to make ends meet. And several proposals are aimed at ensuring that the big corporations and the very wealthy pay their fair share.
- Today, we're focused on two of those proposals – the call for a greater investment in our kids, and a common-sense plan for reforming our tax code so that it rewards work and not just wealth.
- You'll hear a lot today about closing the carried interest loophole. In a word, it's this: a special provision in the federal tax code that allows hedge fund and private equity managers to treat much of their income as investment income rather than ordinary, wage income.
- It's a loophole that should never have been. In fact, it was created before anyone had ever heard of a hedge fund. It allows these select few, very wealthy individuals to pay a tax rate of 20% -- a far lower rate than so many middle-class families pay.

- It's a loophole that everyday New Yorkers and Americans don't get to take advantage of. But those same everyday people are paying the price for it.
- It's this simple. When those at the very top pay less than they should in taxes, it has to be made up by someone else. It could mean higher taxes for working and middle class people. Or it could mean less money for the things we know lift people up – public education, for one.
- We want Washington to close this loophole not just because it's unjust. It's literally a matter of dollars and cents. Conservative estimates say it's costing the Treasury billions and billions of dollars – scarce resources that could go to paying our teachers more, to improving classroom conditions, and to reducing class size.
- So we want this change in the tax code not just on a moral basis. And we don't call for it to punish success. Instead, we want to create more success stories. That's what this debate is all about.
- Now, the debate over closing the carried interest loophole has gone on for almost a decade. But we are at a pivotal moment. We're hearing from more and more candidates who seek to lead our nation as president that the time has come to end this loophole. And it's members of BOTH major parties.
- I have to admit that I did a double-take when I heard Donald Trump call for it to be closed. It's an understatement to say that Donald Trump and I don't agree on much. But on this one, he's right.
- And others are now starting to say the same – with Jeb Bush calling for an end to the carried interest loophole just this week.
- So today, we're calling today for EVERY presidential candidate to endorse this sensible proposal and commit to CLOSING the carried interest loophole in the first 100 days of their administration. This can be done, and it must be done.

- But rather than just hearing it from me, I want to introduce our next speaker so that he can kick off the film.
- Robert Greenwald is the founder and president of Brave New Films. He is an award-winning television, feature film and documentary filmmaker, responsible for more than 50 TV movies and miniseries. In 2002, Robert was moved by the stories of voter rights abuses in the 2000 presidential election, and chose to turn his talents to documentary filmmaking that explored issues of social and economic injustice.
- Robert is a master of using new media outlets to distribute his creative work to massive new audiences online. The documentaries produced by Brave New Films have been streamed across all seven continents and have been viewed over 70 million times. Robert is the recipient of many awards for his activism. He received the 2001 Peabody Award and the 2002 American Film Institute Producer of the Year award, and his films have earned 25 Emmy nominations. He is also an inaugural signer of The Progressive Agenda, which I urge everyone to check out at www.ProgressiveAgenda.us. Ladies and gentlemen, Robert Greenwald.

Lena Fontana Talking Points

- No one I know ever became a teacher for the money.
- You know when you become a teacher that it's not going to make you wealthy, but that's OK because the job is so rewarding in so many other ways.
- As a teacher, you can help make the difference between kids succeeding or falling behind.
- We all work so hard to do right by our students because we know that what we do matters. But what also matters is how much funding our schools get.
- When our schools are underfunded, we feel it, and so do our students.
- Sometimes it even means teachers having to go into their own pockets to pay for basic supplies.
- When millionaires and billionaires get tax breaks, it means they aren't paying their fair share to help our schools and our kids.
- When I learned that billionaire hedge fund managers probably pay a lower tax rate than teachers do, I was shocked. Not only is it unfair to teachers like me, it's so unfair to my students.
- I think it's great that people are successful, but I want the kids I teach to have the opportunity to be successful too. That means making sure they have the resources they need to learn and grow.
- It really is a choice: the money hedge fund managers get in tax breaks has to come from somewhere.
- If you're for better schools, you should also be for closing the carried interest loophole.

Lynn Parramore Talking Points

- We've heard in the film and from others up here how unfair the carried interest loophole is, and I couldn't agree with that more.
- I can say it's not just unjust; it's also bad for our economy.
- Economies work best when they reward hard work and entrepreneurial risk taking.
- The carried interest loophole does neither - it's nothing more than a giveaway to billionaire hedge fund managers for doing their jobs investing other people's money.
- The carried interest loophole does nothing to help the economy. In fact, it keeps money highly concentrated at the very top of the economic ladder, something that is inherently bad for the economy.
- For decades, conservatives have argued that if we just give more tax breaks to those at the top, the money will magically trickle down and everyone will do better.
- The problem with that thinking? We've seen their plan in action - it doesn't work.
- In fact, the staggering inequality we face in America today is the direct result of policies that gave tax breaks to the people who need them least.
- The carried interest loophole is a stark example of this.
- Hedge fund managers do not need a tax cut. They are multimillionaires and billionaires. They can afford to pay a little more in taxes to do things like funding early childhood education.
- Inequality is a huge problem, and taking this step alone won't fix

it. But it's such an obvious and important step in the right direction that it's hard to believe this is even up for debate.

- Ending the carried interest loophole is the right thing to do for working people, and for our economy.

Event/Meeting Briefing Information

4:55pm Panel begins -- Parramore as moderator begins with two questions for panelists

5:05pm Questions are collected from audience and sorted to avoid duplication and ensure resonance

5:25pm Program Ends

Topics:

- TPA, income inequality, carried interest loophole, tax fairness, education.

Background:

Shortly after TPA was launched on May 12th, we got a call from Robert Greenwald, progressive filmmaker and TPA signer.

He had an idea on how to use the power of film to highlight the great disparity between the incomes of hedge fund managers and Kindergarten teachers – and highlight the inequity in the fact that the former pays a lower tax rate than the latter.

The film is being debuted on Thursday in NYC, and will also be live-streamed on HuffingtonPost.com.

We will be using new media tools – Facebook, Twitter, Instagram, Periscope – to urge that the video be shared online to a massive audience.

A couple of years ago, very few aspiring elected officials were talking about income inequality. Throughout 2015, we've seen more and more elected officials and candidates from BOTH political parties discussing the problem.

Recently, we've heard a number of excellent proposals for combatting inequality – including, just in the past several days – Donald Trump and Jeb Bush calling for an end to the carried interest loophole.

We're using every tool at our disposal to combat inequality in NYC (UPK – just this week). But we need Washington to be our partner if we want to tackle this problem at its core.

It's time for Americans from all walks of life to come together and pressure Washington to make this change so that we can make the tax code more fair, and invest more in our schools.

We don't do this to punish success. Rather, we do it to create more success stories.

FYI: Katrina vanden Heuvel is a board member of Brave New Films. She will not be in attendance.

BACKGROUND ON Robert Greenwald:

Robert Greenwald, founder and president of Brave New Films (BNF), is an award-winning television, feature film and documentary filmmaker. He has produced and/or directed more than 50 TV movies and miniseries, including The Burning Bed (1984), starring Farrah Fawcett and A Woman of Independent Means (1995), starring Sally Field; as well as the feature films Steal This Movie (2000), starring Vincent D'Onofrio as 60's radical Abbie Hoffman, and Breaking Up (1997), starring Russell Crowe and Salma Hayek.

Greenwald turned to documentary filmmaking in 2002, inspired by pervasive voter rights abuses in the 2000 U.S. presidential election. He found audiences eager for substantive investigations of social issues, told through personal stories, and chose to bypass the usual gatekeepers by devising creative means of distribution, first through house parties, and ultimately through the Internet and social media. The documentaries produced by Brave New Films have been streamed across all seven continents and have been viewed over 70 million times and counting.

At BNF, Greenwald has produced and directed eight full-length documentaries and over a dozen short videos, uncovering corporate abuse, the military industrial complex, the unbridled political influence of billionaires, and the unfair and unbalanced tactics of Fox News. His full-length features include; Uncovered: The War on Iraq (2004); Outfoxed: Rupert Murdoch's War on Journalism (2004); Wal-Mart: The High Cost of Low Price (2005); Iraq for Sale: The War Profiteers (2006); Rethink Afghanistan (2009); Koch Brothers Exposed (2012); and War on Whistleblowers: Free Press and the National Security State (2013). Unmanned: America's Drone Wars (2013) is BNF's latest feature-length documentary.

Greenwald is the recipient of many awards and accolades, including a Maggie Award from the Planned Parenthood Federation, the Peacemaker Award from the Physicians for Social Responsibility, the City of Justice award from LAANE, the 2007 Norman Felton and Denise Aubuchon Humanitarian Award, and Liberty Hill Foundation's Upton Sinclair Award. Greenwald was honored in 2013 by the ACLU Foundation of Southern California for his activism and also received the 2001 Peabody Award and the 2002 American Film Institute Producer of the Year award. His films have garnered 25 Emmy nominations.

BACKGROUND ON Lynn Parramore:

Lynn Parramore is an author and cultural theorist. She is Contributing Editor at AlterNet and writes for Reuters, Al Jazeera, and other outlets. She holds a doctorate in English and cultural theory from New York University.

BACKGROUND ON Lena Lombardi:

Lena Lombardi has been a Gifted Education teacher at P.S. 132 for six years, and has taught Gifted and Talented Kindergarten for five of those years. She graduated from Hofstra University's Honors College with a Bachelor of Arts degree in Public Relations and worked briefly as a publicist out of college before deciding to follow her heart and pursue her lifelong dream of becoming a teacher. She completed her certification through a career-change program at St. John's University, and she currently holds a Master of Science degree from SJU in both Childhood Education (Grades 1-6) and Gifted Education (Grades K-12.) She was born and raised in Williamsburg, Brooklyn and attended the elementary school at which she currently teaches. She and her husband (John) currently live in Middle Village, Queens.

MAIN POINTS TO LAND:

- Income inequality is the crisis of our time. Here in NYC, we're doing everything in our power to combat it – UPK, after-school, paid sick leave, building affordable housing, fighting for a higher minimum wage, demanding more from developers.
- But to really get at the root of the problem, we need Washington's help.
- The Progressive Agenda comes down to a very simple concept – we need to reward work again. We need to reward work, not wealth – work.
 - As a society, as a nation, as a government, we reward wealth more and more every day, which is just concentrating wealth into fewer and fewer hands. It's not just smart, clever people in the financial industry. It's a set of government policies that continually allow them to concentrate the wealth.

- There's no two ways about it: we have an economic crisis in this country. The issue of income inequality is a profound threat to this country and its future – that we are experiencing growing divisions that must be addressed.
- The Progressive Agenda is a movement from the grassroots. It's an urgent call for change. We're hearing the voices of people every day – people all over this country. Recently, we saw demonstrations in 200 cities (60,000 people) across this country for a $15 dollar minimum wage.
 - Something is changing in America. It's time to take that energy and crystalize it into an agenda that will make a difference. It's time to put people ahead of profits – value work over wealth. It's as simple as that.
- We'll be calling on leaders and candidates to address these issues, to stiffen their backbones, to be clear, and to champion these progressive policies.

Transitions

- There's no reason that a billionaire hedge fund manager sitting by the pool at his beach house should be paying a lower rate of taxes than the guy who pilots his private jet.

Key Stats/ Examples

- If you're going to reduce the income gap, you need two things: 1) more investment in programs and policies that lift the floor for working people (paid sick leave, $15 min wage, child care) and 2) more revenue from those at the very top – millionaires, billionaires, and wealthy corporations (close carried interest loophole, close CEO pay loophole, Buffett Rule, end tax breaks for companies that ship jobs overseas).
- President Obama pointed out that the top 25 hedge fund titans in America earn more than every kindergarten teacher in America. Think about that. $12 billion for 25 people – more than all the money earned by the women and men teaching our four and five year olds - COMBINED.

- In NYC, 46 percent of the people are at or near the poverty level. That is based on a statistic from the Bloomberg Administration. It came out first in 2013. It's essentially the same today, 46 percent of people at or near the poverty level, one paycheck away.
- Minimum Wage - In 2014, four states passed minimum wage increases by referenda. They were all red states. Something bigger is going on here that I think indicates people are more and more demanding some solutions. The grassroots is demanding it.
- A typical American family, in real income terms, is making less today than they were a quarter century ago.
- The wealthiest one percent captured 91% of all the income gains since the Great Recession ended.
- And now we have the greatest income disparity since the 1920s – and it's getting worse.
- The two issues that we're highlighting today are closing the carried interest loophole, and investing more in education. We don't advocate that to punish success, but to create more success stories.

The Progressive Agenda:

- Raise the federal minimum wage, so that it reaches $15/hour, while indexing it to inflation.
- Reform the National Labor Relations Act, to enhance workers' right to organize and rebuild the middle class.
- Pass comprehensive immigration reform to grow the economy and protect against exploitation of low-wage workers.
- Oppose trade deals that hand more power to corporations at the expense of American jobs, workers' rights, and the environment.
- Invest in schools, not jails-- and give a second chance to those coming home from prison.
- Pass national paid sick leave.
- Pass national paid family leave.
- Make Pre-K, after-school programs and childcare universal.
- Expand the Earned Income Tax Credit and protect and expand Social Security.
- Allow students to refinance student loan debt to take advantage of lower interest rates, and support debt-free college.

- Close the carried interest loophole.
- End tax breaks for companies that ship jobs overseas.
- Implement the “Buffett Rule” so millionaires pay their fair share.

Close the CEO tax loophole that allows corporations to take advantage of “performance pay” write-offs.

Robert Greenwald Talking Points

- As a filmmaker, I am fortunate to have an opportunity to tell stories that really matter.
- The story in this particular project is an alarming one. The disparity in income - and in tax rates - between hedge fund managers and kindergarten teachers are one of the starkest examples of the inequality we see in our country.
- What's more, this subject is harsh reminder of how our economy and our tax code are increasingly tilted towards rewarding existing wealth over hard work.
- When I spoke with teachers for this film, they didn't realize how unfair this status quo was.
- I did a double take myself when I learned that 25 hedge fund managers made more last year than every single kindergarten teacher in America.
- But what really shocked the teachers I spoke to - and I think you saw these reactions in the film - was that in all likelihood those hedge fund managers paid a lower tax rate than they did.
- The carried interest loophole represents such a big problem, but most people know about it. It's kind of a complicated issue, but once you learn the details, it's hard to imagine someone NOT being outraged!
- So our job as progressive leaders, and my job specifically as a filmmaker, is to get the word out. If people know about this issue - it won't matter if they are Democrats, Republicans or Independents - I think they'll demand real change.
- That's what's been so gratifying about this project - and about being a part of The Progressive Agenda in general. We're not sitting identifying injustices; we are proposing real solutions to remedy them.

- Ending the carried interest loophole is such an important step towards addressing inequality in America.
- As a coalition, The Progressive Agenda is working every day to spread the word, mobilize progressives across the county and demand real solutions to our inequality crisis. It's a thrill and an honor to be able to play a part in that effort.

SAMPLE Questions from Moderator Lynn Parramore

People argue a lot about what drives inequality of economic inequality. Liberals point to skyrocketing CEO pay, the weakening of unions, and low wages. Conservatives often blame technological change and lack of job skills. Why is this particular driver, the carried interest loophole, considered so unfair and unjustified by people across the political spectrum?

How does the continuation of policies like the carried interest loophole change us as a society? What do we stand to lose if we don't end it?

Why is the carried interest loophole something people should care about? If the carried interest loophole were closed, what kind of difference would it make for ordinary Americans?

Let's take a step back and talk about income inequality in America: how did we get to the huge disparities in income and opportunity that we face today? How is the carried interest loophole a part of that story?

Some people say efforts like this are just class warfare - that progressives just want to punish those who have been successful and score political points by doing so. How do you respond to that?

Donald Trump recently said that hedge fund managers are "getting away with murder" when it comes to the tax code. Jeb Bush just in the last few days proposed getting rid of the carried interest loophole. It seems like this should be a no brainer. Why is it so hard to get Republicans in Congress on board with this?

Supporters of the carried interest loophole say that ending it would discourage investment and hurt the economy - how do you respond to that?

What can people sitting at home right now actually do to help make ending the carried interest loophole a reality?

How can progressives join forces to push for changes like closing the carried interest loophole? What is The Progressive Agenda and how can people be a part of the work you are doing?

Why is early childhood education such an important part of this conversation? Can you talk about efforts to address that issue locally?

Hi all -

I was just informed that there was a group call today about the event tomorrow that I was unaware of.

Seems like there is some confusion regarding:

1. How the film is being played.

- Both Pace and the live streamers have the link.
- And Robert has a USB drive with it on it, as a back-up

2. The background slide image

This is an opportunity to have a convo with a sympathetic reporter/interviewer and look at the administration with income inequality being at the center of it, but not limited to just inequality.

She says she wants to go with Lombardi. Attached talking points just have different heading and file name to reflect that. Below is some info about herself that she sent to Hayley, in case helpful. I am giving her a quick message briefing later tonight.

I have been a Gifted Education teacher at P.S. 132 for six years and have taught Gifted and Talented Kindergarten for five of those years. I graduated from Hofstra University's Honors College with a Bachelor of Arts degree in Public Relations and worked briefly as a publicist out of college before deciding to follow my heart and pursue my lifelong dream of becoming a teacher. I completed my certification through a career-change program at St. John's University, and I currently hold a Master of Science degree from SJU in both Childhood Education (Grades 1-6) and Gifted Education (Grades K-12.) [REDACTED]

[REDACTED]

[REDACTED]

Lena Lombardi Talking Points

- No one I know ever became a teacher for the money.
- You know when you become a teacher that it's not going to make you wealthy, but that's OK because the job is so rewarding in so many other ways.
- As a teacher, you can help make the difference between kids succeeding or falling behind.
- We all work so hard to do right by our students because we know that what we do matters. But what also matters is how much funding our schools get.
- When our schools are underfunded, we feel it, and so do our students.
- Sometimes it even means teachers having to go into their own pockets to pay for basic supplies.
- When millionaires and billionaires get tax breaks, it means they aren't paying their fair share to help our schools and our kids.
- When I learned that billionaire hedge fund managers probably pay a lower tax rate than teachers do, I was shocked. Not only is it unfair to teachers like me, it's so unfair to my students.
- I think it's great that people are successful, but I want the kids I teach to have the opportunity to be successful too. That means making sure they have the resources they need to learn and grow.
- It really is a choice: the money hedge fund managers get in tax breaks has to come from somewhere.
- If you're for better schools, you should also be for closing the carried interest loophole.

Subject: NY Post inquiry

Hi Dan and Karen,

Why is the mayor's office using a government account to promote this event considering The Progressive Agenda is paid for by Campaign For One New York?

Thanks

De Blasio's 'Progressive Agenda' to host film screening

By Laura Nahmias

1:17 p.m. | Sep. 8, 2015

The Progressive Agenda, the new organization formed by Mayor Bill de Blasio to push his platform on a national level, is hosting its first public event since the coalition's launch this spring — a screening of a documentary film by Robert Greenwaldon Thursday.

De Blasio will attend the screening, one of the event's organizer's confirmed.

In addition to showing Greenwald's new documentary, entitled “Hedge Fund Billionaires vs. Kindergarten Teachers: Whose Side Are You On?” the event will feature a question-and-answer session with both the filmmaker and the mayor.

Greenwald is the founder and president of Brave New Films. His films include "Wal-Mart: The High Cost of Low Price" and "Outfoxed: Rupert Murdoch's War on Journalism."

A copy of the invitation obtained by POLITICO New York describes the event as “a film screening on income inequality.”

The Progressive Agenda was formed in May, and is funded by the Campaign For One New York, the nonprofit 501(c)4 de Blasio created to push his top agenda items, including universal pre-kindergarten and the creation of affordable housing.

The Progressive Agenda has been hosting meetings with other elected officials, mayors and civil rights leaders since its official launch, one of its organizers said. De Blasio also held a conference call with former labor secretary Robert Reich in June, calling on Hillary Clinton to oppose the Trans-Pacific Partnership trade deal.

The event’s website argues for closing the carried interest tax loophole, which is one of the planks of the Progressive Agenda’s platform.

“Did you know that the top 25 hedge fund managers in the United States make more than every single kindergarten teacher in the country — combined?” an invitation to the event reads.

“There are a lot of reasons that the math shakes out so unfairly, but one of them is the carried-interest loophole, a tax law that essentially gives these one-percenters a much lower tax rate than they should be paying.”

The Progressive Agenda is planning to hold a presidential forum for 2016 presidential candidates in the fall, but has not released details about who has been invited, who is attending or when the event will take place.

there are two "streams" of invites. CH invited to their list. TPA invited to our list. I'll leave the rest to Ian. But looping in Jim as well.

Is the RSVP phone on the hedge fund invite a city government number? Rich is still on this.

My statement said to pay for the film and the event.

I am going to say the mayor is allowed to invite guests to any and all events by phone or email. Correct?

Karen, I don't expect an answer on this tonight obviously, but how can you say no taxpayer funds are being used for this when City Hall emails and the RSVP phone line is being used? Is the political action committee sending them out?

Yes on record positive but Emma can do the mechanics of how it happened off record.

Maybe they will incorporate maybe not.

The on record should be straightforward. Good for hard working Americans. Glad to see many leaders joining the ranks of support.

Okay, I am prepared to say whatever you tell me... Or we could have Emma go on background... But this is a fast ball right down the middle, and I think it advances our message if we explain that this is a startling but happy new development, given the Governor's reluctance to join our fight for $15 these past seven months...

I feel like if we say it in a positive way, we shouldn't mind going on the record. We could even do a cheeky line like: "First Donald Trump joins our effort to close the carried interest loophole, and now this. I'm not sure why everything is now moving in a progressive direction, but we're just happy that it's happening!"
